Therefore, when I saw this language which I thought might take it away from the Department, I raised the question with the distinguished Senator from Georgia. He then took it up with the Department, because the Senator from Nebraska, the Senator from Georgia, and I had the same desire to make sure that the Research and Marketing Act would succeed. The reply which came to him from the Department of Agriculture—he supplied me with a copy of it—satisfied him and it satisfies me, as long as the Senator from Georgia is watching this particular point.

Mr. WHERRY. In order that the RECORD may be clear relative to this matter, I may say it is my understanding that this language is added for no other reason than as a bookkeeping proposition which mechanically helps accomplish what has been suggested. It in no way impairs, but might to the *n*th degree bring about what the distinguished Senator from New Mexico has just mentioned. Is that correct?

Mr. ANDERSON. That is correct.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota raised some question about research activities relative to wheat straw. I had happened to mention research in the use of wood waste materials. The Department, in order to show that the work has been done, has sent me quite a list of pamphlets relative to wood waste, and also relative to the waste of wheat straw. I am sure the Senator from North Dakota will be glad to see them.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. Does the Senator have any objection to placing in the RECORD for reference the titles of the two pamphlets to which he referred, in order that any farmer who desires to obtain them may have reference to them?

Mr. RUSSELL. I shall be glad to do that. One of them is Appendix 1, "Examples of Progress Under the Research and Marketing Act of 1946," issued May 25, 1950. The second is Appendix 2, "A List of Publications Reporting Results of Work Under the Research and Marketing Act of 1946," dated the same date.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, may I make a further inquiry?

Mr. RUSSELL. Certainly.

Mr. LANGER. Does the distinguished Senator know whether they are available to other Senators?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes. If the Senator will have one of his assistants call up the Department, the Department will have the documents on the Senator's desk in the morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment beginning on page 168, after line 3, striking out certain language and inserting other language ending on page 169, line 25.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Agricultural Economics," on page 171, line 16, after the word "trends", to strike out "$2,600,000" and insert "$2,720,000."

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, last year Congress appropriated for this purpose $2,621,000. The House Appropriations Committee recommended a cut of $21,000, which brought the figure to $2,600,000. The Senate committee has raised it to $2,720,000. That is an increase of $120,000 over the House figure, and is virtually an increase of $100,000 over the amount appropriated last year. In view of the war situation, it seems to me we should make reductions in funds of this kind. I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 172, line 7, after "(7 U. S. C. 951–957)", to strike out "and data on farm construction as provided by title V of the Housing Act of 1949 (Public Law 171), $2,725,000" and insert "$2,904,000."

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, last year Congress appropriated $2,817,000 for this purpose. The House bill cut the figure to $2,725,000. The Senate committee has proposed $2,904,000. This is an increase of $86,000 over the appropriation of last year, and an increase of $179,000 over the House figure. It also carries with it the elimination of funds to carry out the provisions of research on farm construction. So we are giving this group more money with which to do less work. I hope the committee amendment will be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, may I ask the distinguished Senator from Georgia whether the amendment involves a pay increase? Is it approximately the same figure as that provided last year?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, this item includes the pay adjustment costs which were authorized through the pay-increase act which was passed last year. When we take into consideration the pay adjustments under the Federal Employees Compensation Act which was enacted last year, with the sums appropriated, there is less money available for this purpose in the coming fiscal year than there was in the past fiscal year.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I do not wish to delay the proceedings, because there will be many of these proposals, but, as a general principle, it seems to me we should have the agencies absorb the salary increases by a decrease in personnel. The appropriation called for is an increase of $86,000 over last year which should help to some extent but the rest should be absorbed.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I wish to point out that this item is substantially below the budget estimate, and it does not allow all the pay increases. The Department is absorbing and has absorbed a part of them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 172, line 7.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Agricultural Research Administration—Office of Administrator," on page 172, line 19, after the word "of", to strike out "Advisory Committee" and insert "advisory committees."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 174, to strike out:

WORKING CAPITAL FUNDS, AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH CENTER

For the establishment of a working capital fund, to be available without fiscal year limitation, for expenses necessary for furnishing facilities and services by the Agricultural Research Center to Government agencies, $300,000. Said fund shall be reimbursed from applicable appropriations or other funds to cover the charges for such facilities and services, including handling and related charges, for equipment rentals (including depreciation, maintenance, and repairs), for supplies, equipment and materials, stores of which may be maintained at the Center, and for building construction, alterations, and repair, and applicable appropriations or other funds may also be charged their proportionate share of the necessary general expenses of the Center not covered by the annual appropriation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Research on agricultural problems of Alaska," on page 175, line 10, after the word "Alaska", to strike out "$260,000" and insert "$280,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment, was under the subhead "Office of Experiment Stations," on page 175, line 14, after the word "advance", to insert "where applicable."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 175, line 24, after "(7 U. S. C. 427–427g)", to strike out "$2,863,708" and insert "Sections 3 and 5, $2,863,708, and sections 9 and 11 of said act as added by the act of August 14, 1946 (7 U. S. C. 427h, 427j), including administration by the Office of Experiment Stations in the United States Department of Agriculture, $5,000,000, no part of which latter amount shall be used for beginning construction of any building costing in excess of $15,000, except that a poultry breeding house may be constructed at Purdue University at a cost to this appropriation of not to exceed $29,000;".

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, may I be privileged to ask the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee a question?

Mr. RUSSELL. Certainly.

Mr. DOUGLAS. This is an appropriation of $5,000,000 to carry out the purposes authorized under the Bankhead-Jones Act of 1945, is it not?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will permit me, this is transferred from a previous amendment and placed at this point. It is the amendment as to which I raised the question awhile ago. It was previously carried under the research and marketing operations, and it will be recognized from the earlier amendment that it is a transfer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 176, line 17, after the word "Alaska", to strike out "$27,500" and insert "$37,500", and in line 21, after the name "Puerto Rico", to strike out "$7,406,208" and insert "$12,416,208."

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia if where the bill mentions the amounts which shall be available to Hawaii, Alaska, and Puerto Rico, it does not also include agricultural experimental work which should be done in the Virgin Islands. In other words, are the Virgin Islands continued as a part of Puerto Rico in the operation of the experimental station?

Mr. ANDERSON. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will not hold me strictly to this, but I believe it does not include the Virgin Islands, because income-tax payments from the Virgin Islands are not transferred to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think that is altogether correct. So far as I am advised, there is no experiment station in the Virgin Islands. There is one in Puerto Rico. I conclude that a great deal of the material gathered in Puerto Rico would be available to the Virgin Islands. Their research in agriculture would be along similar lines. They have practically the same agricultural economy.

Mr. BUTLER. It is true that the Puerto Rico station is approximately 40 miles from the Virgin Islands, and the experimental work done in Puerto Rico does contribute to the economy of the Virgin Islands, but the Virgin Islands are not mentioned. I think the Virgin Islands receive the benefit of much of the experimental work conducted in Puerto Rico, but I should like to have it understood that the Puerto Rico station is also responsible for experimental work in the Virgin Islands as well as in Puerto Rico.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from Nebraska may be entirely correct, and, in view of his past experience as former chairman of the committee dealing with the islands, he undoubtedly is correct. But I know of no authorization for that purpose. It would be necessary to pass specific legislation for an experiment station in Puerto Rico. There is none in the Virgin Islands of which I have any knowledge.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not asking that the appropriation be increased; I do not believe it is necessary; but I think it is necessary for Congress to understand that the station in Puerto Rico serves the Virgin Islands as well as Puerto Rico.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think any information developed should be available to the Virgin Islands.

Mr. CORDON. I should like to address a question to the Senator from Nebraska. I happened to have been with him on an inspection trip in the Virgin Islands, during the course of which we both visited an experimental farm which was operated either by the Department of Agriculture or the Department of the Interior. My inquiry is whether the Senator from Nebraska can identify the department which was responsible for the experimental work.

Mr. BUTLER. The experimental farm which has been conducted in the Virgin Islands is conducted under the general supervision of the Department of the Interior jointly with the Virgin Islands government. I do not believe that the Department of Agriculture is officially connected with the experimental farm in the Virgin Islands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 176, line 21.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Salaries and expenses," on page 177, line 5, after the word "of", to strike out "December" and insert "September," and in line 8, after the name "Puerto Rico", to strike out "$237,500" and insert "$252,500."

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Human Nutrition and Home Economics," on page 178, line 9, after the word "subjects", to strike out "$1,500,000" and insert "$1,763,200."

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, as the text of the bill indicates, this represents an increase of $263,000 above the amount appropriated by the House. It is a slight increase of $14,000 above the amount appropriated last year. I should like to read from the House report, at page 130, as follows:

The funds for this Bureau have increased from $360,000 in 1941 to approximately $1,800,000 in 1950, including Research and Marketing Act and special research fund allotments. The committee believes that continued increases in appropriations for the work of this Bureau cannot be justified at this time, and the survey of rural family living expenses cannot be provided for, and that development of farmhouse plans is adequately covered by the regular work of this and other bureaus.

The committee expects this Bureau to make a thorough reevaluation of all of its activities during the next year to make certain that attention is devoted only to the most essential research work in the field of human nutrition and home economics.

Mr. President, in view of the need for great budgetary stringency and the prospect of greatly increased war appropriations, I hope the committee amendment will be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 178, line 9.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Animal Industry—Salaries and expenses," on page 178, line 23, after the word "Hatcheries", to strike out "$2,250,000" and insert "$2,319,000."

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, this is an increase of $69,000 above the House bill. It seems to me that the House appropriation of $2,250,000,000 should be sufficient. The Senate committee report speaks of provision for repairs, reconditioning, and replacement of facilities. In view of the current situation it seems to me that the facilities could be allowed to remain as they are for a while. I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I wish to ask the chairman in charge of this section of the bill if the bill includes an appropriation for salaries of meat inspectors located in terminal markets.

Mr. RUSSELL. That is a separate item, which has not yet been reached. We did not alter the House figure with respect to the Meat Inspection Service.

Mr. BUTLER. Did the committee increase the amount?

Mr. RUSSELL. No; it did not. The House allowed the budgetary estimates except to the extent of some $50,000. I may say that the excitement about meat inspectors grew out of the so-called Taber-Thomas amendment, which proposed to cut 429 meat inspectors from the Service. That provision has been stricken from the bill. The Meat Inspection Service is adequately provided for.

Mr. BUTLER. That is the phase in which I was interested.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Meat Inspection Service is adequately provided for in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 178, line 23.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 179, line 1, after the word "products," to strike out "$1,300,000" and insert "$1,350,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 179, line 15, after the figures "$7,950,000", to strike out the comma and "including not to exceed $30,000 for the acquisition of land and construction of four buildings for inspection of livestock at Canadian border ports of entry."

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I have an amendment on page 179, on line 15, which I should like the clerk to report. It deals with the Meat Inspection Service.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, as I understand, we must conclude consideration of committee amendments before taking up individual amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's amendment, which deals with the text of the bill, is not in order.

Mr. MAGNUSON. The amendment would add only a small amount to the $7,950,000 figure, which was the amount provided by the House.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I believe such an amendment would not be in order at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's amendment, being an amendment to the text of the bill, is not in order at this time.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Would my amendment be in order after the section now under consideration is disposed of?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's amendment would be in order after the disposition of the committee amendments.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the distinguished Senator from Washington must leave the city, I ask unanimous consent that he be allowed to submit the amendment at this time. He must leave for his home State.

Mr. RUSSELL. If the Senator desires to leave, I have no objection.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I thought this would be a good time to bring up an amendment with reference to the Meat Inspection Service.

Mr. RUSSELL. I would not accede to the Senator's request on those grounds.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I thank the Senator from North Dakota. I can wait until later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington withdraws his amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, at this time I should like to submit an amendment which I intend to propose. It is on page 472. I realize that is far from the page which we are now discussing. The amendment relates to the Commodity Credit Corporation. I thought it could be presented at this time. I send the amendment to the desk and I ask that the Clerk read it. I also ask that an explanation of the amendment may be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks. I may say that in attempting to make it possible for the Commodity Credit Corporation to deal with some of its problems, inadvertently no provision was made that the Corporation shall not be subject to the apportionment procedure. I should like to present the amendment at this time and to have the explanation printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table. Unanimous consent is requested that the amendment be read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Clerk will state the amendment.

The legislative clerk read the amendment as follows:

On page 472, strike out all after the word "States" and the period in line 1 down to and including line 7 and in lieu thereof insert the following: "No funds (other than funds for administrative expenses) available for price support, surplus removal, and related operations, with respect to agricultural commodities shall be subject to apportionment pursuant to this section."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Mexico that his explanatory statement be printed in the RECORD at this point?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXPLANATION

The Secretary of Agriculture, through Commodity Credit Corporation and other means available to him, is required or authorized to make available price support on agricultural commodities and to engage in surplus removal operations with respect to agricultural commodities. The nature of these operations makes it impracticable to apportion the funds available therefor, since the extent or character of the operations must necessarily be related to supply and market conditions, and such conditions cannot be foreseen with any degree of certainty, but instead, are dependent upon weather, general economic conditions, and other fluctuating factors. Accordingly, it is believed that the price support operations and the surplus removal operations and other related programs with respect to agricultural commodities should be excluded from the provisions for apportionment. The operations which would thus be removed from the provisions requiring apportionment would include operations such as programs undertaken by the Secretary of Agriculture under section 32 (the act of August 24, 1935, Public Law 320, 74th Cong., as amended) and the price-support program, the supply program, the foreign purchase program, the commodity export program, and the storage facilities program, as described in the Commodity Credit Corporation's budget program for the fiscal year 1951.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, in view of the parliamentary situation, I shall not ask for a vote on my amendment at this point. However, I should like to discuss it for about 5 minutes, inasmuch as both the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] are interested in it. In answer to inquiry from the Senator from Nebraska, the Senator from Georgia has made the statement that he thought the House amount was adequate with respect to salaries for Federal meat inspectors. It may be that the committee heard evidence to that effect. However, the amendment I am suggesting clearly points out that reductions which would result would cripple stock inspections at certain points. My amendment would add $2,500 to the bill. It would be added for the purpose of employing a part-time veterinarian in the Union Stockyards at Seattle. The Department of Agriculture tells me that the budgetary requirement and the amount in the committee bill would not allow for such part-time inspection service. It would leave the Seattle Union Stockyards without any inspection at all. In view of the fact that we have reduced the import duty on Canadian beef from 6 to 3 cents a pound, there has developed some very serious competition to the packers in the Seattle area. Immediately after the Federal inspection was discontinued the Canadians started shipping their cattle into the United States as dressed beef instead of as beef on the hoof. Shipments on the hoof, of course, would give the slaughtering and packing business to Seattle firms, but unless this small amount of $2,500 for a part-time veterinarian is provided the cattle will not be shipped into the Seattle Union Stockyards.

Another important point involved is that without Federal inspection livestock can be shipped from Canada to the United States only on direct assignment for slaughtering. With Federal inspection such livestock can be shipped for resale.

It may be that enough money is included in the appropriation, but all my information is that the Seattle Union Stockyards will be without the services of a part-time veterinarian, and it seems to me to be very false economy from the standpoint of public health not to have a sufficient amount to make possible a part-time veterinarian in that area. It is not too large a stockyard. It does not compare with the Omaha, Chicago, Kansas City, and South St. Paul stockyards, but it is an important union stockyard for our section of the country.

Mr. President, I do not know why it is, but it seems to me that every year since I have been a Member of Congress we have been confronted with the appropriation for Federal meat inspectors. If it is not the Weather Bureau it is the Federal Meat Inspection Service, and every year we have to make the attempt to restore very minute amounts to keep the inspection alive.

I do not know what the situation is in the other stockyards, but I am going to ask for $2,500 so that the inspection service can be kept alive in the Seattle Union Stockyard. I hope the Senator from Georgia, in view of this particular situation, may accept the amendment, take it to conference, and see whether or not this amount is adequate. The decreased appropriation in the bill does not amount to much, but it does stop all Federal inspection in that particular stockyard.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I could not accept the amendment without having some idea the Department as to the effect it would have on the other stockyards. I daresay a number of other stockyards are situated about like the one in Seattle, and if we agreed to give a part-time inspector to Seattle, we would certainly be bound to give such inspectors to the other stockyards similarly situated.

This bill carries $12,800,000 for meat inspection. That is $159,000 below the Budget estimate. It seems to me that with appropriation of $12,800,000, we ought to be able to save the $159,000 by which the House decreased the Budget estimate of $12,959,000.

I shall be glad to get a statement as to whether the other stockyards are similarly situated, but I could not agree to accept the amendment at this time.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I brought the matter up because the situation is such that the amount provided, it is said, is not sufficient to keep a part-time man in the stockyards in Seattle. The officials say that it is because of the budget ceiling. They did not present a formal request to the committee to keep this place alive. There may be other like cases.

I hope that for the sake of saving $2,500 a stockyard serving a great area will not be denied the right of Federal inspection, because it has even this further effect, that the Canadians, instead of sending their cattle to Seattle on the hoof to be slaughtered, are sending their dressed beef. With inspection, the tendency is to send the cattle from Canada into the Seattle Union Stockyards for consumption in that area.

Mr. President, I shall not submit the amendment until the parliamentary situation is favorable, but I thought this was a good time to bring up the subject of Federal meat inspectors.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator makes a very appealing case. The agricultural appropriation affords more opportunities for appealing pleas than any other single feature in the entire bill. At one time I counted them and found there are 1,863 different activities under this chapter of the bill. Some of those 1,863 activities are carried in every State in the Union. There has never been any instance where those within the States have not desired to have their services improved. Of course we all hear about those things in the Nation's Capital, because it is our responsibility to represent our people.

I should like very much to be able to accept the Senator's amendment, but I cannot do it if it is going to result in discrimination against any other stockyard that is similarly situated.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I am not familiar with what the effect would be on other stockyards. If the Department says that because of the budget limitation they cannot assign an inspector to Seattle, a great area of the country served by one union stockyard would be denied the right of inspection.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does the Senator know whether there are other inspectors there?

Mr. MAGNUSON. There are none there.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Department ought to assign one to that area, because they have, I believe, approximately, 4,000 inspectors.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I am deeply interested in the discussion taking place between the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Georgia. I wish to repeat the statement that the United States Department of Agriculture Inspection Division operates almost solely for the protection of the health of American citizens, and I think it is an extremely important service to be continued for the benefit of the people as a whole.

I am surprised that there is any question that $2,500 cannot be available out of a total of $12,800,000 for the services referred to, but I am willing to take the word of the chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, who has the bill in charge, that the Taber amendment is not being considered in connection with this particular item.

Mr. RUSSELL. No; the Taber item is not in the bill. By committee action it was stricken out. There is nothing in the appropriation for this item that brought about the drastic reduction in meat inspectors, as to which we all received innumerable telegrams. The Taber-Thomas amendment would have resulted in dropping four-hundred-odd meat inspectors. As I have said, I think there is a total of nearly 4,000. I am told by the clerk of the committee that there are 3,220. They are provided for in this bill. That being the case, it seems to me that the Senator from Washington could get a part-time inspector, and I should be delighted to join with him in making a representation to the Department of Agriculture, so that there could be at least one part-time inspector assigned to the Seattle area.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, in view of the statement of the Senator and in view of the facts that there are some 3,300 inspectors, it seems to me that what the Senator says is correct. I shall talk to the Department again and see if we cannot get one for the Seattle area, at least one, perhaps a full-time inspector.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator could get at least a part-time one, I believe.

Mr. MAGNUSON. It seems to me we have the same problem as to meat inspection coming up all the time. I know it has been coming up since I have been a Member of Congress.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a statement showing the situation in the Seattle area, together with a letter from Henry J. Kruse, president of the Seattle Packing Co.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the statement and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MAGNUSON

I am offering an amendment proposing the addition of $2,500 to funds provided in the bill for the item "Animal disease control and eradication," under the Bureau of Animal Industry.

In line 15, page 179, I propose to strike out the figure "$7,950,000" and insert in lieu thereof $7,952,500."

This addition of $2,500 is urgently needed to provide Federal inspection at the Seattle Union Stockyards. I have talked to the Department of Agriculture informally about the need for Federal inspection at the Seattle yards. The Department agrees that Federal inspection is highly desirable, but because of the budget ceiling was unable to present a formal request to the committee.

Through 1946 the Seattle yard had Federal inspection. The Eightieth Congress cut rather drastically funds allotted the Bureau of Animal Industry, and, in consequence, Federal inspection at the Seattle Union Stockyards was discontinued. Inasmuch as these yards do not now have inspection, there is a tendency for cattle, particularly feeder stock, to be diverted to other areas.

In addition, serious competition has developed for Seattle packers from the Canadians. Immediately after Federal inspection was discontinued, Canadians started shipping their cattle into the Pacific Northwest in the form of dressed beef rather than on the hoof.

A current factor in this influx of dressed beef was the tariff reduction, effective January 1, 1948, from 6 to 3 cents per pound. Both management and labor in the meat packing industry believe that restoration of Federal inspection will encourage the shipments to come in the form of livestock rather than dressed beef.

Shipments on the hoof will give the slaughtering and packing business to United States firms and workers, and would go some distance toward cushioning the competitive effects of this particular type of Canadian import.

The important point is that without Federal inspection, livestock can only be shipped from Canada to the United States on direct consignment to a slaughter. With Federal inspection, such livestock can be shipped for resale.

It is obvious that there is great merit in making it possible for the Bureau of Animal Industry to restore Federal inspection at the Seattle Union Stockyards. The amount involved is only $2,500—just enough to pay the half-time salary of a qualified veterinarian.

I hope the Senate will adopt this amendment.

SEATTLE PACKING CO.,
Seattle, Wash., June 30, 1950.

Senator WARREN G. MAGNUSON,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Although the Department of Agriculture recognizes the need for restoring Federal inspection at the Seattle Union Stockyards, it is unable to do so because of a shortage of funds. The Department estimates, however, that only $2,500 is needed to restore the Federal inspection at Seattle as only the part-time services of one veterinarian is required. It is, therefore, suggested that you obtain an appropriation of $2,500 for this purpose. This is important to the Northwest for the following reasons.

Increased control of livestock diseases is a protection to the general public. With Federal inspection the Seattle Union Stockyards would be assured that a veterinarian would be in charge and that adequate inspection with regard to communicable diseases would be in effect.

Livestock producers will be better served under Federal inspection. At the present time the Northwest is served by only two Federal-inspected yards. These are located at Spokane and Portland. Under State law, health requirements are enforced by the Brand Division which require that all female stock be tested and tagged when sold, except when sold to a packer for slaughter or for resale at a federally inspected yard.

Since a federally inspected yard has a veterinarian on duty, the additional expense and delay required by testing female cattle is avoided. Inasmuch as the Seattle Union Stockyards are not now inspected, livestock producers tend to make their shipments either to Spokane or to Portland.

Slaughter in the Northwest area would increase. Since reductions in the tariff on meat from Canada to the United States from 6 to 3 cents per pound effective January 1, 1948, and the termination of shipments from Canada to the United Kingdom, meat importations to the United States have been greatly increased. Due to higher wage rates, expenses, etc., in the United States, most of this importation is now in the form of meat that is dressed. It would be desirable to have it come in the form of livestock so that the slaughter and processing could be performed here. Federal inspection at the Seattle Union Stockyards would therefore greatly facilitate the movement of livestock from Canada. Without Federal inspection livestock can only be shipped on direct consignment to a slaughterer. Whereas, under Federal control such livestock could be shipped for resale. This would increase the flow of Canadian cattle and would help the packers in that area to meet the competition of Canadian packers. This competition has been particularly severe in the Seattle area since the reduction in tariff duty.

Very respectfully yours,

HENRY J. KRAUSE,
President, Seattle Packing Co.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the able Senator from Washington whether any slaughtering is done in the union stockyard at Seattle.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Yes.

Mr. THYE. There is slaughtering there?

Mr. MAGNUSON. There is much slaughtering, but because of the lack of meat inspection, the cattle on the hoof have not been coming in, and the dressed beef has been coming in.

Mr. THYE. It seems to me very strange that the Department of Agriculture would permit slaughtering to take place and not have a meat inspector on hand. If that is the situation in Seattle, I would join with the Senator from Washington in asking that the Department of Agriculture assign a meat inspector from the regular appropriation, or join the Senator in seeking to have allowed the amount he has requested. It seems to me to be incredible that the Department of Agriculture does not have one of its meat inspectors at a point of slaughter.

Mr. MAGNUSON. We never have been able to get one.

Mr. THYE. I cannot imagine that.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I appreciate the Senator's interest. We never have been able to get one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 179, line 15.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next committee amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Dairy Industry," on page 182, line 14, after the word "butter", to insert "not to exceed $100,000 for construction of 10 or more housing units for employees"; and in line 15, after the amendment just above stated, to strike out "$1,600,000" and insert "$1,735,000."

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, the amendment provides an increase of $135,000 above the amount appropriated by the House. Apparently it is for two purposes: $35,000 for repairs, and $100,000 for housing facilities, that is, 10 houses for personnel. The personnel of this bureau, as I understand, are in Maryland near Greenbelt, and the House committee in turning down the recommendation to build 10 houses said that in their judgment it is quite possible that these employees might find housing at the Greenbelt housing project. In view of the need for economy, I hope the committee amendment will be rejected.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of the amendment. I do not see why we should build houses at the place designated at $10,000 apiece.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, $35,000 is what the committee allowed of a total of $125,000 requested for repair and reconditioning of physical facilities at field stations. There have been no repairs made in any of the various field stations of the far-flung experimental organization of the Department of Agriculture since 1941, except emergency repairs. There has been very little painting done. The Government of the United States has an enormous investment in all these operations. We have allowed about 15 to 20 percent of the budget estimates for repairs in each instance. We did not allow the full amount. We allowed just sufficient to make the most emergent repairs and to prevent the deterioration and loss of capital investment.

Now as to the question asked by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota. The $100,000 was asked for, for the purpose of constructing 10 houses at Beltsville to take care of the labor that is employed at the dairy there. The testimony showed that there were no houses available, and that the men working at the dairy have to get to work very early in the morning, and ofttimes have to work very late at night. The Department could not obtain for the labor wage scale workers, who would have to get up in Washington perhaps at 2:30 or 3 o'clock in the morning and go all the way to Beltsville to reach their place of work.

It is a nonrecurring item, and the houses will be self-liquidating, because rent is charged for them. The rent that is paid for these houses will eventually liquidate this $100,000 item. I do not think it is going to affect the whole universal scheme of salvation if we refuse to appropriate this $135,000, but I think it is a good business deal to appropriate it, because there is an enormous turnover in employment at the dairy. The work is very important. The research work carried on there with respect to dairying and livestock is of vital concern to every person in the United States who owns a cow; and a great many people own cows.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, considerable testimony was heard by the committee as to why the sum in question should be allowed. The able Senator from Georgia has stated the situation very ably. The men employed in the dairy division must be there early and late. A great amount of expense would be incurred by a man who had to drive from his home in Washington to the experiment station, and then home again. Many of the employees, in fact, do not possess automobiles. Therefore, they are under a handicap in going to and from their home in the city. I believe the amount of $100,000 is reasonable. The cost is only $10,000 a unit. Much thought and consideration and discussion was given to this item at the time it was considered. It was finally agreed to in committee.

Mr. RUSSELL. I thank the Senator from Minnesota. I wish to reiterate that the amount in question will amortize itself. The houses will pay for themselves from the rents collected.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. FREAR. In order to clarify the situation in my own mind, I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia a question. He said the project will amortize itself. If and when the houses are built, will the rentals received from the properties revert to the Treasury or to the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. RUSSELL. I am quite sure the money will go to the Treasury, unless there is an act to the contrary which deals specifically with this particular subject. A cow is occasionally sold at Beltsville, and the proceeds go to the Treasury.

Mr. FREAR. Then the Department of Agriculture would not have the authority to expand the rentals?

Mr. RUSSELL. Oh, no.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, may I ask the distinguished Senator from Georgia if it is not true that Beltsville, Md., where the Bureau of Dairy Industry has its station, is just a mile or so from Greenbelt, where a town of 7,400 persons has been built as a housing project?

Mr. RUSSELL. I am not really apprised as to the distance between Greenbelt and Beltsville. I do know that the Department of Agriculture does not own any homes in Greenbelt, and that it is some distance from Beltsville.

Mr. President, the evidence on this subject is very convincing. I may say that I had overlooked the fact that we took testimony on this matter. It shows that prior to the submission of budget estimates the possibilities of obtaining such housing in the surrounding area, including the town of Greenbelt, had been fully explored, but without success.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 182, lines 14 and 15.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next committee amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Agricultural and Industrial Chemistry," on page 182, line 25, after the word "thereof", to strike out "$7,750,000" and insert "$8,500,000."

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, this is an increase of $750,000 above the amount appropriated by the House. It is an increase of $105,000 above the amount Congress appropriated last year. In view of the need for economy, I suggest that it would be much better if we reject the committee amendment and save $750,000.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 2591) to amend the Public Health Service Act to support research and training in arthritis and rheumatism, multiple sclerosis, cerebral palsy, epilepsy and blindness, and other diseases, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. PRIEST, Mr. BIEMILLER, Mr. WILSON of Oklahoma, Mr. WOLVERTON, and Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR., were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

(At this point Mr. MORSE addressed the Senate on the subject of recent increases in food prices. At his request, and, by unanimous consent, his remarks were ordered to be printed in today's RECORD at the conclusion of the debate on the general appropriation bill.)

GENERAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1951

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7786) making appropriations for the support of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 182, line 25.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Plant Industry, Soils, and Agricultural Engineering," on page 183, line 24, after the words "crops", to strike out "$3,400,000" and insert "$3,475,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, this is an increase of $125,000 for research in the field of fruits, vegetable, and specialty crops.

May I ask why the increase is to be put into effect?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, this item includes $50,000 of the estimated $190,000 for repairs and reconditioning of physical facilities at field stations to strengthen the research program; $60,000 for research work on vegetable sources for the new drug, cortisone, and $15,000 additional to provide a total of $40,000 for gladiolus research. Those are the three items that go to make up the increase of $125,000. As I have stated heretofore, there has been no substantial repair work done on these field stations for 8 or 10 years. Certainly no one can challenge the importance of cortisone. It is a drug recently discovered which has proved to be a boon to humanity suffering from rheumatism and arthritis. It now comes from the gall bladders of animals, I believe, and it takes 10,000 cows to supply enough to treat one case. There have been some amazing developments, and it would be worth while to appropriate a much greater sum than the one in question in order to discover additional sources of supply so as to secure adequate quantities of cortisone.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, is the distinguished Senator from Georgia giving a justification for the increase in the appropriation referred to at the bottom of page 183? If so, I am afraid that I must oppose it, not because I do not like it, but because of the general need for economy.

Mr. RUSSELL. That is the item which I was discussing and attempting to explain.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 184, line 3, after the word "plants", to strike out "$2,950,000" and insert "$3,075,000."

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia a question.

Mr. RUSSELL. I shall be glad to try to answer the question.

Mr. FREAR. I notice that $40,000 is to be appropriated for research in connection with gladioli. Is the gladioli industry in this country sufficiently large for the Federal Government to appropriate $40,000 for research?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, evidence before the committee in the past 2 or 3 years has disclosed some facts in connection with the gladioli industry which were rather amazing to one who is not familiar with it. It is a $110,000,000 industry. Tens of thousands of small producers who own and operate florist shops produce their own gladioli and sell them in those shops. A new disease has appeared, of which no knowledge had been had heretofore. It threatens to wipe out the only source of livelihood of these thousands of farmers and to seriously impair the opportunity for livelihood of thousands of small operators of flower shops. In my judgment, the appropriation is completely justified. When we have a spectacular attack upon the corn crop by the corn borer, we do not hesitate to appropriate fifteen or twenty million dollars with which to combat it. The amount appropriated here for the gladioli industry is not disproportionate with what we are doing in other lines of agriculture.

Mr. FREAR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I should like to observe that the reduction in income tax paid by one producer of gladioli in the State of Florida for last year was a good deal more than the total amount that is involved in this appropriation. That reduction in income-tax payment was caused solely by the attack on the gladioli crop by this new disease which we wish to combat through this experimentation.

Mr. RUSSELL. Some progress has been made, and we hope we may be able to conquer the disease.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 184, line 3.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 195, after line 4, to insert:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 196, line 9, after the figures "$1,300,000", to insert "of which $30,000 shall be made available for the establishment of a forest utilization service unit in the Southwest."

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, before we reach line 9, I should like to send to the desk an amendment which proposes an insertion on line 6 on page 196.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Apparently the Senator's proposed amendment is an amendment to the text of the bill. Therefore it is not in order at this time.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 196, line 9.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 196, line 14, after "section 10", to strike out "$880,000" and insert "$1,000,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Forest development—Roads and trails," on page 196, line 22, after the words "administration", to strike out "$10,348,000" and insert "$12,000,000."

Mr. MURRAY. I send to the desk an amendment to the committee amendment and ask that it be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 196, line 22, it is proposed to strike out "$12,000,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$14,500,000."

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, this amendment is necessary because of the construction of Hungry Horse Dam in Montana. The cost of the construction is $108,000,000. As a result of the construction of this dam, highways, and roads in the forest have been destroyed. Therefore it will be necessary to build new roads to take the place of the roads which have been covered up. The logging and timber industry is the most important industry in the area, and it is absolutely necessary to construct these roads in order to protect the industry. As I understand, the Bureau of Reclamation has authority to construct new roads whenever old roads are destroyed. However, they are limited with respect to the character of roads that may be constructed under such circumstances. The roads which it will be necessary to construct in this case are of a character which will require expensive construction. They are to be constructed on the side of hills.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Is it not customary to include the cost of relocating highways in the cost of the dam itself? I wonder why the cost of relocating highways for a dam should be put in an agricultural appropriation bill. So far as I know they are always put in the appropriation for the dam itself.

Mr. MURRAY. The item now before the Senate is under the title "Forest Development Roads and Trails." The roads to which I refer are forest roads.

Mr. AIKEN. Even if a forest road is destroyed by the construction of a dam, it would have to be replaced by the agency of the Government which constructed the dam.

Mr. MURRAY. The agency of Government is limited in the amount of funds which it can expend in the construction of a road. The specific road I have in mind is of a character which requires very expensive work, because it is on the side of a mountain. It is a road 52 miles long on the west side of the reservoir, and it must be built in order to make the national forest timber accessible. The timber products from the mills in this area are worth more than one and a half million dollars a year to the local industries. Wages alone amount to about $1,000,000 a year. In the construction of the Hungry Horse project the Bureau of Reclamation has stated that it may request appropriations to replace roads which will be inundated or damaged by the reservoir, but not for roads of higher standards or involving superior construction not required in connection with construction of the project.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask the Senator from Montana whether he came before the committee in connection with this amendment, or whether he got a budget estimate for it?

Mr. MURRAY. Apparently it was——

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not believe it has ever come before the committee. We are reading the appropriation bill for committee amendments, and I hope the Senator will withhold his amendment.

Mr. MURRAY. I am satisfied to withhold it. However, it may be that we could complete its consideration at this time. We have spent some time on it already.

Mr. McKELLAR. Was this proposed amendment laid before the committee?

Mr. RUSSELL. Oh, no.

Mr. MURRAY. This additional amount is necessary because of the special conditions which exist. The special conditions result from the construction of this huge dam, which has cut off the roads which were previously in use. In order to continue the lumber and milling industry it is necessary to construct this road. As I understand, in the construction of the Hungry Horse project the Bureau of Reclamation has stated that it may request appropriations to replace roads, but not for roads of higher standards or involving superior construction not required in connection with the construction of the project. A survey is now under way to determine the location and cost of the road and the amount which the Reclamation Bureau is authorized to finance.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, my reason for questioning the Senator from Montana as I did was because I thought it might be establishing an undesirable precedent if we undertook to charge the costs of work of this nature to the Department of Agriculture, when the cost is really necessitated by the operations of some other Department of Government. I am not questioning the need of the road, because I do not know anything about it. I merely questioned whether this is the part of the appropriation bill where the amendment shall be added.

Mr. MURRAY. The Department of Agriculture has jurisdiction over forest roads and trails.

Mr. AIKEN. Is this a forest road or an access road? The Senator has said there is a million and a half dollars worth of timber a year coming from the forest in this area. I think provision for access roads is included under some other appropriation.

Mr. MURRAY. This amendment is not for building a new road to give access to the timber. The business involved has been in existence for a number of years, and it is a very important industry in that section, amounting to many million dollars. With the roads now cut off as a result of the construction of the dam, it is necessary speedily to provide a new road.

Mr. AIKEN. I still think it should be charged to the cost of the dam, instead of as an agricultural appropriation.

Mr. MURRAY. The Bureau of Reclamation is assuming that part of the cost which it is able to take under the Bureau of Reclamation law. The cost of the road is now being studied, and it is estimated at $4,000,000. The share of the Bureau of Reclamation is estimated at from one and a half to two million. To make certain that funds are available to build a road of the necessary standard, two and a half million dollars should be added to the Forest Service appropriations at this point. To the appropriation of $12,000,000 provided in the bill, we are asking that two and a half million be added to order to make provision for the road.

Mr. AIKEN. Does this request come from the Forest Service?

Mr. MURRAY. I understand it has the approval of the Department. I have not any evidence of it here, but I know they have talked to me and have talked to my office about it, and the amendment was prepared for me by the Department.

Mr. AIKEN. Will the Senator yield, so that I may ask the Senator from Georgia if the Forest Service requested this appropriation?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not doubt that the Forest Service would like to get all the money it could for roads and trails, but it did not especially request this appropriation, because it could not. It has a limitation on its budget estimates.

I have a brief statement to make in connection with the amendment when the Senator from Montana concludes.

Mr. MURRAY. I submit the matter.

Mr. RUSSELL obtained the floor.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield so that I may address a question to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. RUSSELL. I have the floor.

Mr. HOLLAND. Can the Senator advise the Senate as to whether the proposed increase of two and one-half million would be supported by the authorization, or whether the $12,000,000 completely uses up the authorization?

Mr. RUSSELL. I cannot say as to that. I think there is adequate authorization to take care of the two and a half million dollars, but I hope the Senate will not approve the amendment. It is entirely out of line with anything else in the bill, proposing as it does to appropriate two and a half million dollars for one immediate project, for something which sounds almost suspiciously like a superhighway. There is nothing that causes us more trouble than forest roads and trails. There are innumerable forests scattered throughout the United States, and in all of them roads are desired. I do not doubt we could spend $20,000,000 on forest roads, to the delectation of the people living in the communities adjacent to them, and those who go into the forests for fishing and recreational purposes.

Mr. President, it is certainly all out of reason to ask two and a half million dollars above the Budget estimate for one road, even though it be one leading to a project so important as is the Hungry Horse Dam. This road ought to be built, if built at all, by funds that come from the same source and are used for the same purposes for which the dam is constructed, and the Forest Development Road and Trail item should not be loaded up with such an item. It is not justified or sustained by any budget estimate.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, I should like to add a word about the amendment. It properly belongs under the appropriation for the Interior Department, Bureau of Reclamation. All States have projects, perhaps on smaller scales than the one referred to by the Senator from Montana. In my own State there are some where there are parks nearby, and roads are needed. The money for the proposed road should come under the appropriation authorized for the dam.

I am opposed to the amendment for another reason. The agricultural bill already contains a vast sum of money, and the public looks upon it as an appropriation for agriculture. If one made an analysis he would find that probably only about one-third of the money appropriated goes to agriculture. If this proposed appropriation is added, for another item which is not at all agricultural in nature, it only increases the amount apparently appropriated for agriculture but looked upon by the public sometimes as a subsidy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I should like to offer an amendment to the committee amendment, striking out the figure "$12,000,000" on line 22, page 196, and substituting $6,000,000"; in other words, to cut the appropriation in half.

Last year we spent a litttle over $10,000,000 for the item of forest roads and trails. The House provided the same appropriation for the coming year as was made last year. The Senate committee raised the figure by $1,600,000.

Mr. President, I have been going back over the history of appropriations and expenditures for roads in national forests and national parks, and I find very large sums spent over the years. In view of the national emergency, it seems to me we should slow up on road construction, and save $6,000,000 on this item, and that is the effect of my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Acquisition of lands for national forests," on page 197, line 14, after "(16 U. S. C. 513–519, 521)", to strike out "$100,000" and insert "$401,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Farm and other private forestry cooperation," on page 199, line 15, after the word "exceed", to strike out "$490,382" and insert "$785,034"; in line 16, after the word "exceed", to strike out "$671,392" and insert "$449,200"; and in line 17, after the word "exceed", to strike out "$138,226" and insert "$65,766."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Flood control," on page 200, line 3, after the word "expended", to strike out "$10,750,000" and insert "$9,880,000."

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I wish to congratulate the committee for making a reduction below of approximately a million dollars the amount provided by the House. I am informed, however, that of the final figure of about $9,900,000, which is being recommended for flood control in the Columbia Basin area, $1,900,000 is for planning, leaving about $8,000,000 for construction.

Mr. President, the word "planning" seems to have a mesmeric influence upon Congress, causing us to appropriate very large sums for planning. In view of the national emergency, I hope that the committee will persevere in its good work, and will consent to a reduction in the appropriation to $8,880,000, which will leave approximately $8,000,000 for construction, but will reduce the total for planning from $1,900,000 to nine-tenths of a million dollars. I hope the committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I regret very much that I would not feel authorized to accept the amendment. If there is any justification for a reduction in this item, it should be applied to the construction item and not to the planning item.

Mr. President, the planning item involves a Nation-wide plan to prevent the siltation of all of the vast reservoirs we are building at such enormous cost all over the United States. The jurisdiction of the Board of Army Engineers does not extend beyond the immediate watershed on which a dam is located. The Soil Conservation Service undertakes to draw plans for all the tributaries to the main streams so as to prevent the loss of fertile soil from thousands of acres of land to which we look for that which we eat and wear, as well as to prevent impairment of the investment of the United States in the main reservoirs. The truth of the matter is that we are probably 20 years behind now with our planning. The planning is going forward. It is not limited to the Columbia River. Surveys are being made upon thousands of small streams throughout the entire United States. I do not believe there is any item in the bill which is more inextricably connected with the future welfare of the United States and the sources of our food and fiber and the preservation of our soil resources than this planning item. I hope the Senate will reject the Senator's amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] to the committee amendment on page 200, line 3.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next committee amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Soil Conservation Service," on page 201, after line 17, to strike out the subhead "Salaries and expenses."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 202, line 14, after the word "information", to strike out "$52,900,000" and insert "$52,400,000."

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] to give me an explanation as to why this cut was made, and whether or not the cut will fundamentally affect the soil-conservation programs which are being planned at the present time. I have received a number of letters from persons in Minnesota who are vitally interested in soil-conservation activities, in which they have told me that a cut in the budget amount would jeopardize their plans of operation, including more areas and more counties being brought in under the program of the Soil Conservation Service.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I may state that there is no cut in the budget item, because the figure allowed by the Senate committee is approximately one-half million dollars above the Bureau of the Budget estimate. This is the one item where the House allowed the Department $1,000,000 above the Budget estimate. Since the House had allowed $1,000,000 above the Budget, it seemed that if there was any place where we could cut the bill by reducing in part of this increase above the Budget estimate, it was here. It is true there have been a number of new soil-conservation districts organized, and they do not have all the technical staff they should have. But splendid progress is being made in the soil-conservation districts.

It is not the kind of thing that can be done overnight. Plans must be drawn, and then the farmers must be induced to accept the plans. Then there may be required a 20-year program on one farm in order to complete the plans. It would be highly desirable, if conditions were not so difficult with respect to public funds, to increase this item about $4,000,000 and give all the soil conservation districts all the technical help they need. But I believe that by the proper use of the large number of technical soil conservation operators the service has, if it distributes them properly, this work can be carried out without any damage whatever resulting from this modest cut.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator, because I think the people of Minnesota recognize that the Senator from Georgia is an outstanding expert in this field. I wanted the RECORD to show exactly what his observations on this subject were.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am not an expert, but I am an ardent advocate of soil conservation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 202, line 14.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next committee amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Land utilization and retirement of submarginal land," on page 203, line 2, after the word "note", to strike out "$1,490,000" and insert "$1,665,175."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Water conservation and utilization projects," on page 203, line 10, after the word "expended", to strike out "$400,000 and insert "$500,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Production and Marketing Administration—Conservation and use of agricultural land resources," on page 203, line 23, after the word "States", to strike out "$282,500,000" and insert "$283,000,000"; and on page 206, line 2, after the word "States", to strike out the colon and the following additional proviso: "Provided further, That not to exceed 5 percent of the allocation for the agricultural-conservation program for any county may be allotted to the Soil Conservation Service for services of its technicians in formulating and carrying out the agricultural-conservation program and the funds so allotted shall not be utilized by the Soil Conservation Service for any purpose other than technical and other assistance in such county."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Sugar Act," on page 207, line 23, after "(7 U. S. C. 1001–1160)", to strike out "$60,000,000" and insert "$63,750,000."

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I assume that the amounts which we appropriate under the sugar act are more or less prescribed by the act itself?

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from Illinois is correct. Of course, the Senator knows that these funds are derived from a special processing tax upon sugar, and are set apart as payments to the sugar producers in this country. If the sugar production does not warrant the payment of this amount, which is materially below the budget, I will say the remainder is returned to the Treasury. In no years has there been paid to the producers of cane sugar and beet sugar of this country the entire amount collected from the special processing tax which is imposed for their benefit.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I notice that the House appropriated $60,000,000, which was the amount appropriated for the last fiscal year. I think that should be sufficient, and I shall oppose the committee amendment. The Senate committee apparently divided the difference between the appropriation by the House and the recommendation by the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. RUSSELL. The House appropriated the amount which was appropriated last year. The Bureau of the Budget allowed $67,500,000. I do not think that much money will be needed, but out of an abundance of precaution we did allow half of the increase in the budget estimate, which is $3,750,000, which, as I say, is derived from the special processing tax imposed upon sugar for the benefit of the producers of sugar in this country.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is not within the province of the Appropriations Committee, but does the Senator know if the appropriate committee has considered the possibility of expanding the production of sugar further, in order to meet some of the shortages which have recently occurred in our cities?

Mr. RUSSELL. I am not an expert on sugar. I see present the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND], both of whom represent States which produce large quantities of sugar. I may say that the very purpose of these payments is to increase domestic production of sugar. In the last 50 or 60 years we have never produced more than a small percentage of the sugar consumed in the United States.

Mr. ELLENDER. The Senator from Georgia has referred to the fact that only a small percentage of the sugar consumed in the United States is produced in this country. I may point out that about 28 percent of the sugar consumed in the United States is produced in the continental United States. The remainder is imported from our possessions, and from Cuba and other foreign countries.

As the distinguished Senator from Illinois has correctly stated the amount provided is to pay conditional payments to sugar growers pursuant to existing law.

As the Senator in charge of the pending chapter has stated the appropriation requested is $3,750,000 under the budget estimate. Should the amount herein appropriated be in excess of the sum required to meet conditional payments to sugar growers such excess will revert to the Treasury.

Mr. President, I trust that the recommended appropriation will not be disturbed.

Mr. RUSSELL. Seventy-two percent of the sugar consumed in the United States is off-shore sugar. The purpose of the tax, as I said, is to increase the domestic production of sugar.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I know that the domestic production is tied in with the international agreements with respect to production of sugar in Cuba, Puerto Rico, and so forth. But I think the needs of consumers should be given due weight in this matter, because the effect of the international sugar cartel, enforced by international agreements and by national law, has been greatly to boost the price of sugar for city consumers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 207, line 23.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, is the amendment which has just been agreed to the one which comes under the heading "Sugar Act"?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes. As I previously stated, the committee saw fit to approve an increase of $3,750,000 in the amount available for payments to sugar producers.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the amendment provide for any change in the basic Sugar Act?

Mr. RUSSELL. No; the amendment makes no change in the basic Sugar Act whatever. Such action could not be taken in connection with an appropriation bill. Separate legislation would be required to do so.

Mr. WHERRY. I understood the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] to say that the act should be amended so the rights of consumers of sugar could receive greater recognition.

Mr. RUSSELL. What the Senator said was obiter. He merely observed that the law should be changed for the benefit of consumers.

Mr. WHERRY. That would require amendment of the substantive law.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next committee amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Marketing services," on page 208, line 20, after the word "products", to strike out "$2,050,000" and insert "$2,187,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 211, line 23, after "(7 U. S. C. 135–135k)", to strike out "$3,550,000" and insert "$3,495,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Federal Crop Insurance Corporation," on page 212, line 6, after the word "expenses", to strike out "$6,854,000" and insert "$7,204,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Salaries and expenses," on page 212, line 14, after the word "reports", to strike out "$8,150,000" and insert "$8,750,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Loan authorization," on page 212, line 21, after the word "program", to strike out "$25,000,000" and insert "$40,000,000."

Mr. DOUGLAS. This amendment would increase by $15,000,000 the authorization for rural telephones.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes. We increased the loan authorization from $25,000,000 to $40,000,000 for the rural-telephone program which was authorized by an act of last year. It is still $10,000,000 below the budget estimate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, on page 212, line 21.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MYERS subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD, in connection with the REA amendment, which I understand appears on page 212, a statement I have prepared.

There being no objection, the statement of Mr. MYERS was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MYERS

Within the last few weeks, this country has come face to face with a test that may well be as crucial as any in our entire history. In the final analysis—whether the decision is achieved now or some day in the future—it is a test of strength between the free world and the tyrannical world. The success of our cause will depend upon the strength of our free people, the strength of our democratic institutions, and the strength of our economic system. Let us thank God for the opportunities we have had to build that strength and for the enterprise that has impelled us to use our opportunities.

Today, as we give consideration to the appropriation bill before us, I want to bring to the attention of the Senate what the farmers of America are doing through their REA program to build a stronger and more productive agriculture in this country. As a result of the work they have already completed, rural America is infinitely better prepared than ever before to meet whatever emergency may be forced upon us.

If the leaders of our industry should announce that they had just brought into 85 percent of their factories a new kind of low-cost power capable of increasing factory output and efficiency, it would be news that would startle the world. Yet that is exactly what the farmers through the REA are doing right under our very eyes, without fanfare and without headlines.

When REA was established in 1935, only 1 farm in 10 had central station electric service. At the time of Pearl Harbor, 3 farms in 10 had electricity. Despite that relatively small percentage, electricity helped the farmer achieve record after record in production through the years of World War II.

Today, 85 percent of the farms in this country have electric power on them. The REA program that barely had time to get started before the Japs blasted us into the war, has, in the last 5 years, virtually revolutionized American agriculture.

What farmer today would dream of undertaking a dairy farm without electricity? His labor-saving milking machines, his milk-saving refrigeration, his electrically-powered water system—all these and more are essential parts of a well-run, efficient and productive dairy farm.

What has happened on the dairy farm is just one instance. The same thing has been happening on 85 percent of all the farms in America. So multiply these advances by the 5,000,000 farms that have modern electric power today. Then you will begin to appreciate the impact of REA on our agricultural and on our whole economy.

In the electric motor, industrial America has had an efficient source of power for many decades. It has been a significant factor in the development of America as the world's greatest industrial nation. Today the electric motor is also out on the farm, ready to help the farmer grind feed, clean the barn, pump water, dry grain and hay, and in general provide highly essential and low cost power for the farmer.

Consider these things in the light of the crisis that is confronting us today. We have out on the farms of America the equivalent of millions of extra hands that just a few years ago were not available. We have put into our agriculture new power, new efficiency, new productivity. All of it is adding to the strength of this Nation as we go forward in the leadership of the free world.

The progress farmers are making with the help of the REA program is all the more significant when the character of the program is taken into account. The REA program is one of the finest expressions of our democracy. It works on the principle of local control, local ownership, and local accomplishment.

Here is a program that helps the people help themselves. REA is only a lending agency. It is the local people, with the help of Government financing, who are building the power systems that are electrifying the farms. It is the local people who operate these power systems and who are paying back the money to the Government—paying it back with interest.

Last October when Congress passed legislation authorizing loans for the improvement and expansion of rural telephone service, it followed this REA pattern of providing the people with the help they need to do the job themselves. Today this new telephone program is beginning the job of modernizing rural communications as the electric program has been modernizing power and light on the farm during the recent past.

I have always been glad to support the rural electrification program—one of the most beneficial and forward-looking measures instituted by the Roosevelt administration.

It has been of benefit to every part of the country. I am happy to point out the achievements of the REA borrowers in my own State. From 23 percent of our farms electrified when the program started, we have since then forged ahead until now the percentage is well over 90 percent.

We have 18 REA-financed systems in Pennsylvania and these privately owned, locally managed, taxpaying business organizations have already invested $25,000,000 of loan funds in their power systems. They are paying back these loans, in a sound business-like way, while doing a job of building a stronger agriculture in Pennsylvania.

From the time Morris L. Cooke, of my home State of Pennsylvania, as the first Administrator of REA, set the program on its course of progress, this program has built, and built well, the strength of rural America. It is a program in which the people of this country and the free world have a big stake and which must be pressed forward in the achievement of its objective.

It is for that reason that I urge upon you to support the appropriation of the Rural Electrification Administration in the bill before us. This program is making a great contribution to the people of this country at a very minimum of cost, since the loans are being paid back to the Government. This is tremendously important to all of us, whether we are permitted to live in peace or whether we must mobilize our strength for war. REA is an investment that is already paying back dividends many times over in extra power for farmers and for America.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next committee amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Farmers Home Administration—Loan authorization," on page 214, line 6, after "(except grants under 504 (a))", to strike out "$56,350,000" and insert "$71,350,000"; in the same line, after the amendment above stated, to insert "of which not to exceed $3,500,000 of the amount available for the purposes of title I and section 43 of the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, as amended, may be distributed to States and Territories without regard to farm population and prevalence of tenancy, in addition to the amount otherwise distributed thereto, for loans in reclamation projects and to entrymen on unpatented public land."

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Georgia in regard to the amendment in line

6 on page 214. Will that provision encourage the settlement of the more sparsely populated States where there is a large amount of undeveloped land?

Mr. RUSSELL. No; the amount of $3,500,000 is supposed to be available for some irrigated projects in some States which have very small populations, but where the veterans have moved in to take up the lands which are subject to irrigation.

Mr. AIKEN. The amendment would apply particularly to a State such as Wyoming, would it?

Mr. RUSSELL. Exactly, and possibly to three or four other States where such irrigation projects are coming into operation.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HILL. To what amendment does the Senator from Vermont refer?

The VICE PRESIDENT. To the committee amendment on page 214, beginning in line 6 and ending in line 13.

The question is on agreeing to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The next amendment was on page 215, line 5, after the word "acts," to insert a colon and the following additional provisos: "Provided further, That for the purpose of making loans pursuant to the foregoing authority, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use as a public-debt transaction the proceeds from the sale of any securities issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under that Act are extended to include such loans to the Secretary: Provided further, That repayments to the Secretary of the Treasury on such loans shall be treated as a public-debt transaction."

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation from the Senator from Georgia in regard to the amendment. It seems to me that it is clearly legislation on an appropriation bill, and that the amendment, if adopted, would open wide the door.

The amendment is clearly legislation, Mr. President, and it goes into a field which certainly was not dealt with in the bill as it was passed by the House of Representatives. Certainly the language of the amendment is wide in its implications and scope.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I trust that the Senator will withhold any point of order he may intend to propose against this amendment.

I think I would be less than frank if I did not say that the amendment is subject to a point of order. However, identical language has been carried in the appropriation bill for a long time, as a means for the procurement of funds with which to make this type of loans under the Farmers Home Administration. The language of this amendment or similar language was set forth in the budget, just as was the case in last year's bill. It was included in the bill as reported by the House Appropriations Committee, but on the floor of the House the provision was stricken on a point of order.

There is nothing new so far as this method of borrowing is concerned. It has been used for a number of years. Up until now a very creditable repayment record has been made.

There can be no question that the amendment is legislation; but its enactment into law is necessary in order to implement all of the activities of the Farmers Home Administration.

Mr. BRIDGES. What is the repayment record? From my own impression and the impression of the persons with whom I have talked, this amendment would leave the matter wide open.

Mr. RUSSELL. Of course, the Senator realizes that when rehabilitation loans are made under the Farmers Home Administration, we are not dealing with the very best credit risks, because the basic law provides that no such loan can be made until the prospective borrower is able to submit evidence that the loan is not available from any other source. In that connection, the general practice has been to require such statements from the banks in the community, from the production credit agency, and from other sources of credit.

So far as the tenant loan program is concerned, there has been a perfectly amazing repayment record. Repayments are current; in fact, the collections really are ahead of the repayment schedule in the case of the purchase of farms by means of the funds obtained under this provision of the act. In the case of rehabilitation loans, there have been some losses; there can be no question as to that. Those who were administering this portion of the law inherited a great many loans from the old Rural Resettlement Administration and from the old seed loans, which were made only in cases of dire emergency. So the transactions in the case of such loans are included under this heading. Of course, the loans to which I have just referred occurred away back in 1918 and 1920—almost in the days of antiquity, so far as any modern agricultural program is concerned.

However, generally speaking, a very fine record of collections has been made. For the past 5 years the collections have greatly exceeded the loans. A study of the collections would do a great deal to restore one's faith in the honest purposes of mankind, because some of the loans were made years ago and some of the borrowers meantime have left the farms. Yet when they reached a time when they were able to secure employment, they repaid the loans.

This program has been vital in connection with extending aid to veterans of World War II. As I recall, approximately 50 percent of the loans which have been made were made to veterans, and all the new loans being made are being made to veterans.

Mr. BRIDGES. But is there a limitation? Will not the sky be the limit?

Mr. RUSSELL. Oh, no; a limit is set forth on page 214.

On page 215, this amendment would begin with the words:

Provided further, That for the purpose of making loans pursuant to the foregoing authority—

And the loans are limited by the amount set forth on page 214.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do I correctly understand the Senator from Georgia to say that the same language was included in the last appropriation bill?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; and funds have been available. I do not know that the provision in last year's appropriation bill was in identically the same language as the language of this amendment; but the funds have been available from the Treasury, under the last several appropriation bills.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In view of the fact that it is recognized that such language is essential to the program, why has not enabling legislation been introduced through the normal channels, and enacted?

Mr. RUSSELL. I cannot answer that question, because I am not a member of the standing Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I really cannot say why such enabling legislation has not been enacted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will not the Senator from Georgia agree that that is the manner in which the matter should have been handled?

Mr. RUSSELL. Oh, yes; there should have been legislation in that connection. However, I am sure the Senator from Delaware will agree with me that in the case of the appropriation bills generally, certain language has been carried for years in those bills, although normally it would properly be the subject of proposed legislation introduced by some of the standing committes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can understand why the matter might be handled once in this way; but I do not understand why year after year the appropriation bills should carry provisions which are purely legislation.

Mr. RUSSELL. Of course, there is a question as to whether the amendment is legislation. It was regarded as legislation in the House of Representatives. However, there is some question as to whether it is legislation.

This language makes available to the Secretary of the Treasury funds for the purpose of being loaned by him to the Secretary of Agriculture, to be used by the Secretary of Agriculture for this purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do I correctly understand that this authority is limited by the amount set forth on page 214, in line 6?

Mr. RUSSELL. Oh, yes; there is no question about that. It is absolutely limited by that amount.

Mr. BRIDGES. So in this case, if no point of order is made against the amendment, and if the amendment is adopted and is contained in the bill as finally enacted, the provision thus made will be similar to the provision which has been made in previous years in the appropriation bill. Is that correct?

Mr. RUSSELL. That is correct.

Mr. BRIDGES. And the amount is limited to the appropriation set forth on page 214, in line 6; is that correct?

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from New Hampshire is entirely correct.

Mr. President, I would be the last person to be willing to have this language make available an unlimited amount of money, because, of course, the provision is in the nature of an appropriation.

Mr. BRIDGES. I understand that the Senator from Georgia watches these matters carefully, but, of course, I wish to be sure just what we are doing in this respect.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BRIDGES. Do I correctly understand that the Senator from Georgia has no information about this matter, except as to what has occurred in the past?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; I think I can state that, so far as loans for the purchase of land are concerned, the repayments are current, and no losses have occurred. Some losses have occurred on rehabilitation loans, but the funds lost since the Farmers Home Administration was established would be less than 3 percent of the total amount of money made available.

Mr. AIKEN. Is it not a fact that the repayments have been approximately 85 or 90 percent—in short, that the repayments have been good?

Mr. RUSSELL. They have been more than that, under the Farmers Home Administration.

Mr. AIKEN. I think the repayments have been somewhere between 90 and 95 percent in my own State. The repayments to the Farmers Home Administration on loans which were made to the poorest class of agricultural borrowers——

Mr. RUSSELL. The poorest credit risks in the Nation.

Mr. AIKEN. The repayments on those loans have compared very favorably with the repayments to the RFC, I am sure, although the loans made by the RFC were made to what was supposed to be a higher and better class of borrowers—in the case of the RFC, to industrial and financial borrowers.

I am sure a very good record has been made, considering the fact that loans have been made only to persons who could not borrow money anywhere else.

However, I do question the language of the amendment and the continuance of the language year after year in the appropriation bill. It seems to me that there cannot be a clear statement of the Government's financial affairs, in reporting on what our expenditures and our receipts are, until this matter is treated as one related to the expenditures and receipts of the Government, rather than as public debt transaction. I think that point should be cleared up, and that a correction should be made.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. RUSSELL. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. THYE. I should like to raise a question in connection with this matter. Certainly it is never the intention to write off any of these loans unless it becomes a positive fact that the loan cannot be collected. The loan may be carried for a number of years; and it is necessary to review it again and again before a decision finally is reached to write off the loan as being uncollectible.

I think that has been one reason why it has been difficult to write any specific language on this point, because it is the desire not to write off such a loan if it can possibly be collected. For that reason, the language is broad, almost to the point of vagueness, in this case.

However, I would say as the Senator from Georgia has said, that probably there is no other legislative provision which has done more, actually, to take a young man or a young family off the relief rolls or to get them out of a discouraged state of mind, and put them on a self-supporting and self-respecting basis, by providing them with funds, and by doing so at a time when they have neither credit nor proof that they would be good managers, except for the fact that the man may have been a good hired man somewhere in the neighborhood. He may have married a good, sound, reliable young girl, and that was the only asset he had. No banker could loan to a man under those circumstances. Here was an agency from which he could obtain the funds, start farming, and, in due time, pay off the loan.

I could relate three specific cases of young men or young couples who obtained such loans. It was only for a matter of 3 or 4 years. The loans enabled them to carry on. They have made a most remarkable achievement in starting out in life for themselves. I would say it is one of the appropriations which has functioned in a commendable manner. The vagueness of the language results from the lack of knowledge of how to write an act in any manner that would be applicable to such a situation.

Mr. RUSSELL. I thank the Senator from Minnesota for his contribution. I shall be through, as soon as I give the Senator from New Hampshire the specific figures for the year 1949. In that year, $91,507,510 was loaned; principal and interest was collected of $117,114,511.

Mr. BRIDGES. I may say to the Senator that that is a rather unusual Federal accomplishment; but I still say the regular committees of the Congress should provide for this project by law rather than to place the item in a general appropriation bill.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. RUSSELL. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I was not present when the testimony was adduced on this item. In the table for loan authorizations the loan authorization for 1950 was given as $40,000,000 for farm tenancy and housing loans. The estimates for 1951 were $70,000,000. The House bill provided for $56,350,000, which was an increase over last year, but which was short about $13,000,000 of the budget estimate. I have been quoting from the table of loan authorizations found on page 112 of the committee report. The Senate committee has restored the full amount of the budget estimate; in fact, it has gone further than that and added $1,350,000. A footnote reads:

> Includes $1,350,000 transferred from direct appropriation for enlargement and development loans.

So the appropriation exceeds the estimate by $1,350,000. What was the evidence adduced which required the Senate to exceed the budget estimate by $1,350,000? That is my first question. The second question is, Is the $1,350,000 cash, or is it a loan authorization?

Mr. RUSSELL. The House transferred the $1,350,000. I will read to the Senator a brief statement from the House report.

Mr. WHERRY. I have read the side slip.

Mr. RUSSELL. I quote from the House report, page 141:

> An increase of $15,000,000 has been authorized for farm tenancy and housing loans, $1,350,000 has been approved as a transfer from direct appropriation to borrowing authorization for enlargement and development loans under section 504b of the Housing Act of 1949, and an additional $1,000,000 in borrowing authority has been provided for water facilities loans.

The reason for that, and what has happened, is that instead of appropriating the money directly from the Treasury, it was all put into this loan arrangement, to be borrowed from the Secretary of the Treasury. Last year we made a modest appropriation for the Housing Act, and it was made as a direct appropriation from the Treasury.

Inasmuch as the House had included the $1,350,000 in the funds authorized to be borrowed from the Secretary of the Treasury, instead of making it as a direct appropriation, we left it in that shape.

Mr. WHERRY. The point I make is, Was there a decrease by $1,350,000 at some other place in the appropriation bill? This exceeds the budget estimate by $1,350,000.

Mr. RUSSELL. Oh, no.

Mr. WHERRY. The Budget estimate for 1951 is $70,000,000, and the Senate committee has recommended $71,350,000. That is provided through the transfer of funds. What I should like to ask is, If the transfer is made and covers this particular item, where is it deducted in the appropriation bill?

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator is mistaken about the Budget Bureau's estimate. The total Budget estimate was $160,000,000.

Mr. WHERRY. We are talking about farm tenancy and housing loans. I refer merely to loans.

Mr. RUSSELL. Very well.

Mr. WHERRY. If the Senator will refer to page 112 of the report of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate he will find the table of loan authorizations.

Mr. RUSSELL. I understand, but the Budget Bureau's estimate for these items was $160,000,000.

Mr. WHERRY. That is true, but it is broken down into farm tenancy and housing loans, $70,000,000; production and subsistence loans, $85,000,000; water facilities loans, $5,000,000; a total of $160,000,000. The House bill provided $145,350,000. The Senate committee has recommended $160,350,000. The answer is obtained by the breakdown of farm tenancy and housing loans, which we are talking about. I am asking where the $1,350,000 comes from, and where it is deducted in the appropriation bill. It states in a footnote that the $1,350,000 was transferred from direct appropriation for enlargement and development loans.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. WHERRY. I understand that. But why did the Senate committee add $1,350,000 to the farm tenancy and housing loans, unless the amount were taken from something else? The Budget estimate is $70,000,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I think he will find that $1,000,000 of that was taken from water facilities loans.

Mr. WHERRY. I understand that. I have that explanation. But it still runs $1,350,000 above the budget estimate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The entire amount recommended by the Senate committee is $160,350,000, which includes an increase in the farm tenancy and housing loans of $1,350,000.

Mr. WHERRY. That is the point I am making. Why was that done?

Mr. RUSSELL. I am advised by the clerk of the committee, though he has not absolutely shown it to me yet, that it comes off the appropriation and was transferred to loans.

Mr. WHERRY. Does that mean that it comes off the general appropriation for agricultural purposes?

Mr. RUSSELL. That is correct; and it is put into the loan provision.

Mr. WHERRY. Is it deducted in cash? This is a loan authorization.

Mr. RUSSELL. It is deducted from the item for grants. I have the Budget Bureau's estimate now. The item for grants comes under the Farmers Home Administration, for housing.

Mr. WHERRY. Oh, the amount comes off housing, is that correct?

Mr. RUSSELL. On the item found on page 215, in line 16. Whereas the budget estimate is $2,000,000, the item of appropriation is $650,000.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator. That is the transfer that is made, is it?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. WHERRY. One more thing: Is this still a loan authorization of $1,350,000, or is it cash coming from the direct appropriation?

Mr. RUSSELL. It is a loan authorization.

Mr. WHERRY. And are the loans reimbursables?

Mr. RUSSELL. Oh, yes.

Mr. WHERRY. They are reimbursables, the same as the farm tenancy and housing loans?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 215, line 5.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Salaries and expenses," on page 216, line 1, after the numerals "1949", to strike out "$27,700,000" and insert "$29,000,000."

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Georgia a question in connection with page 95 of the report on the general appropriation bill. It has to do with rural electrification and the Southwestern Power Administration. I attended all the hearings on this subject, which, as I recall, were joint hearings of a subcommittee of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and a subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I notice, at the end of the first paragraph under the heading "Rural Electrification Administration," the following:

> The committee believes that no loan should be made for construction of such facilities unless in areas where private power companies cannot or will not furnish adequate power at reasonable rates and within a reasonable time.

I thoroughly agree with the report, and I concurred in it as a member of the subcommittee, but it was my understanding that the Administrator had the determination, because there were such great variations in various sections of the country. As I understand, up to the present time the Administrator has studied carefully the needs, and it was rather left to the Administrator as to the loaning of the money.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not know of anyone who can pass upon that question other than the Administrator of the REA. The funds are made available to him. He is responsible for making loans, and certainly it would be within his jurisdiction to determine the facts and reasons.

Mr. MAYBANK. I thank the Senator from Georgia for his statement.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I also desire to thank the Senator from Georgia for his statement, because I agree with him 100 percent that it is the Administrator who has the jurisdiction and the full authority for determining what rates are reasonable. As the Senator knows, in States which have public utility commissions all existing rates, presumably, are reasonable from the standpoint of the utility companies, because they have been found so by the State commissions.

Utility rates may be reasonable in the light of a company's accumulation of investments, including uneconomical and obsolete ones, and still be completely unreasonable from the standpoint of the cooperative's need for lower cost power to extend electric service to farmers and its ability to obtain such low-cost power by constructing its own generating facilities.

So, as the Senator knows, under the basic law and under the intent of the committee, these are facts within the jurisdiction and the authority of the Administrator of the REA to determine.

Mr. RUSSELL. I never had any other thought with reference to it.

Mr. HILL. I will say to the Senator that as a member of the subcommittee, I did not, either.

Furthermore, even though the rates themselves may be reasonable, other terms and conditions demanded by the power companies may impose intolerable burdens on the cooperatives. Such burdens, appearing in many existing contracts, include restrictions on resale of power, refusal to deliver power to the co-ops' load centers, necessitating costly construction by the co-ops; insistence on ratchet clauses requiring the co-ops to pay for more power than they get; and requirements that the co-ops pay higher rates for power used by consumers in larger amounts.

Of course, the Administrator, in considering whether loans should be made on generating plants or transmission lines, has it fully within his jurisdiction to consider, and he should consider, these questions; is that not correct?

Mr. RUSSELL. They all go to the reasonableness of the rates.

Mr. HILL. For instance, a power company in the State of Alabama, in submitting a proposed contract had in the contract a provision permitting the company to stop serving the cooperatives by reason of war. We know, of course, that in time of war it is very important that farmers have power. We know that during the last war farmers, with less manpower, with less fertilizer, fewer insecticides, and other things which they had in the past, stepped up their crops. One important reason why they were able to do it was because so many of our farms had electricity and the farmers were able to use the electricity to step up war production. So, of course, in determining whether rates are reasonable, the Administrator has it in its jurisdiction and should consider all these questions to which I have adverted.

As the Senator knows, the REA has made loans for generation and transmission facilities only where no adequate source of power was available or where a saving in the cost of wholesale power to the cooperatives could be achieved. The matter is in the discretion and in the judgment and determination of the Administrator, just as the distinguished Senator from Georgia has so well said. The policy of the Administrator as to loans for generating plants and transmission lines is clear. It stands today just as it has in the past.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The able Senator from Alabama has well stated the present policy of the REA, as related in its administrative bulletin which was placed in the hearings. The question I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia is this: Was it the intention of the committee to rewrite the REA law through this paragraph in the report?

Mr. RUSSELL. Not in the slightest degree. We did not undertake to rewrite the REA law, and we did not propose to do anything which would interfere with getting electric current into farm homes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. And there is nothing in either the bill or the report which would overthrow the present policy of the REA?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not know that I am completely familiar with all the details of the present policy, but there is nothing in the committee report which, in my judgment, disturbs the power or the discretion which the Administrator has under the present law. There has been a feeling in some quarters—but, speaking for myself, I did not concur—with reference to putting anything at all in the report dealing with the subject. There has been a feeling that the proportion of loans being made for generating and transmitting facilities by the REA was increasing at too great a rate, perhaps to the detriment of the cause of getting power into farm homes. Hearings were had for four or five days in conjunction with the Subcommittee on Interior Appropriations.

I was not sufficiently well qualified in the science of electricity and its distribution to be able to pass upon each and every one of the cases presented to the committee. They were presented, on the one hand, by those who were very much in favor of transmission and generating lines, and they were opposed, on the other hand, by those who were very much opposed to them. I could not pass upon the question. It was necessary for someone in the administrative end of the Government to pass on it. The Rural Electrification Administration has its Administrator, and it is his duty to pass upon these applications. That is his obligation under the law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In the Senator's judgment, there is nothing in this provision, is there, which would take away from the Administrator his authority or discretion?

Mr. RUSSELL. For my own part, I take this to be an admonition to the Administrator to exercise great care in the making of these loans. As I see it, there is nothing in the bill which changes the law. There is nothing in the report of the committee which could be construed as changing the law.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I believe the committee was justified in stating that no loans should be made for the erection of generating plants unless private power companies cannot or will not furnish adequate electric current at reasonable rates and within a reasonable time. The Subcommittee on Interior was presented with evidence to show that REA loans were being considered on the guaranty of SPA agreeing to purchase all the current produced so as to make possible the discharge of the proposed loan. In other words, one Government agency guaranteeing the loans of another Government agency. Such should not be permitted for obvious reasons.

Mr. President, I should like to read the following language from page 95 of the committee's report as indicative of the fact that the committee realizes that it was not within the province of the Appropriations Committee to change the law on the subject of REA:

> In view of the importance of this matter, the committee respectfully suggests that the standing Committee on Agriculture and Forestry review this entire subject to determine whether legislation is necessary.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes. I agree with that. That is where legislation ought to come from. It cannot come from the subcommittee.

Mr. HILL. If there is to be a change in policy, it ought to come from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, the standing legislative committee of this body.

Mr. RUSSELL. I took that position in the subcommittee. I also took it in the full committee, but was not sustained. However, that is my position.

Mr. YOUNG. Would the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee interpret the paragraph to mean that REA has been making loans in the past which were not justified, and that this was a word of admonition to the REA to curtail some of its present loans?

Mr. RUSSELL. I made no such statement, Mr. President. I said that for my own part I was not sufficiently expert nor would I undertake to go into the merits or demerits of these loans. I think it is a matter for the Administrator of the REA and for the standing committees of Congress.

Mr. YOUNG. I had the same idea. I felt that there was nothing in the language of the bill which would change the present program or do injury to it. My understanding is that if they are not able to get current from existing companies at reasonable rates they may build generating plants as they have done in the past. Does the Senator have the same understanding?

Mr. RUSSELL. Oh, yes. There is no question that in compliance with the spirit and letter of the original REA Act the Administrator would have that authority when it is necessary to get current to the farmers.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I wish to say that what the Senator from Georgia has stated is also my understanding of the matter.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] received a telegram which deals with the subject under discussion. He had to leave before he was able to present the telegram for insertion in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that the telegram be printed in the RECORD, at this point.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> RUTLAND, N. DAK., July 15, 1950.
> United States Senator WILLIAM LANGER:
> Have been informed restrictive language in pending Senate report on Interior and Agriculture appropriations could have bad effects on future administration of generation and transmission loans. Urge your cooperation in bringing about deletion of any language or items that could be construed or interpreted as restricting administration of Rural Electric Administration in any way. The great value of unrestricted policy is in its competitive strength. The good common sense of our cooperatives and Administrator will avoid unreasonable or excessive investment in generation or transmission. But if REA ever loses its power to build facilities whenever or wherever found necessary expedient or desirable—then our co-ops and the people they serve will be at the mercy of the commercial private-owned utilities. On the other hand the threat of real competition will make them willing to coordinate and cooperate for the common and public good. We have achieved a considerable degree of coordination and cooperation with the private-owned public utilities here in North Dakota. We could never have done this with a restricted Rural Electric Administration. Strongly urge your complete vigilance in maintaining a strong unfettered REA and a public power policy that puts the good of the people above any special privilege group.

> OBED A. WYUM,
> President, North Dakota Association of Rural Electric Cooperatives.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, may I inquire which committee amendment is now under consideration?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I wish to discuss this amendment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, may I inquire what was the Chair's statement? I could not hear it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair announced that the amendment under consideration is on page 216, line 1.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should like to point out that last year this organization spent for administration $26,149,000. The House increased the figure to $27,700,000, or an increase of more than a million and a half dollars. The Senate committee has raised this figure still further by $1,300,000. I am very glad to see that everyone seems to approve of the substantive work of the Farmers Home Administration. I think it is doing a very excellent type of work. However, these appropriations would not help the tenant farmers. These appropriations are intended for the officials in the Farmers Home Administration. I hope very much that the Senate will reconsider the action by which it approved the amendment, and I move such reconsideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment has not been approved. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 216, lines 1 and 2.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I hope very much that the committee amendment will be rejected and that we may save $1,300,000. Its rejection would reduce the amount of money to be spent by the officials in the Department of Agriculture. Otherwise they would get a million and a half dollars more than they received for the fiscal year just ended.

Mr. RUSSELL. I merely wish to call attention to the fact that last year we passed a housing bill. The provision for farm housing, when compared with what was provided for urban areas, is somewhat pathetic. We have insured billions of dollars' worth of urban housing. However, when we get $40,000,000 for farm housing all over the Nation, objection is raised to that small amount. Of the billions which we have provided for housing the farmers would get the so-called magnificent sum of $40,000,000 under the provisions of this bill. These are not self-executing loans. Someone must execute them and administer them. The item is $1,000,000 less than the Budget Bureau allowed. We tried to go just as slowly as we could. I think the amendment should be approved.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is my understanding that the House of Representatives included $739,385 to take care of the projects which the Senator from Georgia has described.

Mr. RUSSELL. That is correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Therefore even if we reject the Senate amendment of $29,000,000 and accept the House figure of $27,700,000, that amount would be available to take care of the project which the Senator has described.

Mr. RUSSELL. But that is not for housing alone. Water facilities are involved also. They are considered to be very important.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It does include housing.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That was included at the time the House determined the figure of $27,700,000. It will be found that the House figure was $26,960,615. They decided to make it the round figure of $27,700,000, and included in that item are all the expenses which the Senator from Georgia has described. The Senate Appropriation Committee has increased that item by an additional $1,300,000. As one who voted for the reorganization plans, with the thought that if we would support the President in the reorganization of the Government we would get a lower cost of administration, I now find that under this appropriation bill practically every administrative branch of the Government is calling for an average increase of 8 to 10 percent over and above what was allowed to them last year. I do not understand it. I am beginning to wonder if, as one who supported the Hoover Commission reorganization plans on the basis it would provide greater efficiency, I was not being fooled. Instead of saving 3 or 4 billion dollars a year as was promised if we would accept these reorganization plans, we now find the reorganized departments costing more than the old agencies. I wish the Senator from Georgia would point out why this department should cost the taxpayers approximately 10 percent more than it cost last year, and unless good reasons are given I shall vote against the committee amendment, which increases the amount by $1,300,000.

Mr. RUSSELL. I shall undertake to explain the matter. The amount which was available last year, as I recall, was $26,960,615, if the appropriation for the full year reflected the increase in salaries that was allowed by the Congress.

In the 1950 estimate, the Budget Bureau approved the sum of $618,000 for the expense of making additional farm ownership and water facilities loans to homestead entrymen and others on reclamation projects. I am not altogether familiar with the details of those loans, but members of the committee who are familiar with them, who live in the areas where these projects are now being developed and opened up, stated that that was most important.

Then for costs of making the additional farm housing loans and grants in 1951, and servicing farm housing loans made in 1950, the budget allowed an increase of $2,059,300.

For servicing in 1951 insured mortgages made in prior years and the additional production and subsistence loans to be made in 1950, the budget allowed $362,060.

Then there were the pay adjustment costs, which grew out of the increases in pay given under the Accelerated Pay Increase Act, the Ramspeck Act, and any other acts of Congress, which amounted to $811,615, which made a total of $30,000,000 for the 1951 Budget estimates.

Of that amount, the Senate committee has allowed a total of $29,000,000, which is $1,000,000 below the Budget estimate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I point out to the Senator that it may be $1,000,000 below the Budget estimate, but it is still $2,000,000 more than the amount under which the same agency operated during the past 12 months.

Mr. RUSSELL. I just undertook to explain that there is $2,059,300, for the housing loans in the rural areas.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That law was in effect at the time the House gave consideration to the bill, and the House decided that $26,700,000 was enough.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes, the House decided that, but I do not agree with the House. I do not think these loans will be self-executing. There is no way the provisions of this act can be carried out other than that we have provided.

Time and again I have seen members of the Committee on Appropriations sitting on the floor when there came before the Senate bills to increase the pay of Federal employees and Senators receiving telegrams from one source and another and would come in and vote "aye" to raise the salaries of employees. Then they would go out and telegraph someone, "I voted for your pay increase," and would telegraph another one, "I voted for your pay increase." They received the plaudits of those whose salaries were increased, but later when the Committee on Appropriations received a budget estimate which raised the appropriation a million dollars more than the agency had had the previous year the Senators would come forward and say, "What do they mean by increasing this estimate a million dollars?" The Budget Bureau did not do it; Congress did it by voting for the increases in pay.

The same thought applies when we pass an act such as the Housing Act. We said we were going to let the farmers get just a little housing. Of course, it was hardly enough for them to smell, $40,000,000 over the entire United States, as compared with a billion dollars poured out for housing in the cities. But when we passed that bill and some official came in and asked for a little money to administer the Farm Housing Act, he was told, "You are going away up in your appropriation." We cannot add to the duties of a bureau of Government on such an extensive scale, to deal with farm housing in 3,000 counties in the United States, without allowing for some increase in the appropriation to administer the program.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am very glad to hear the Senator from Georgia point that fact out, because it is one of the facts that need to be brought out. I remind him that I emphasized the same thought in 1949 at the time the Congress passed the pay-increase bills. I was one of the few Senators who voted against these increases, and, if I remember correctly, the Senator from Georgia voted for them. If I am in error, the Senator can correct me. I agree with him fully that it is inconsistent for those who vote for every salary increase and every authorization bill to then attack the appropriations bills and try to convince the public that they are great economizers.

The best way to cut Government expenditures is to stop voting for the authorizations.

Perhaps I am in error in thinking the Senator from Georgia voted for the pay bills.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator's memory is completely in error on that point. It so happened that the Senator from Georgia, the Senator from Arizona, and the Senator from Colorado, who sit in the same row of seats, got together and framed an amendment to reduce every salary increase that was brought out by the Senator's committee, and we got the amendments approved on the floor of the Senate. Then I voted against the bill, after it was amended. As I recall, it was a viva voce vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I stand corrected in my statement then. I do know that there were very few Senators who voted against the salary increases. At that time I took the position Congress should not increase the salaries until we had a balanced budget, and I agree with the Senator from Georgia that it is poor taste for those who have consistently voted for the authorizations to attack the appropriations.

Mr. RUSSELL. I hope the Senator did not understand me to be making a personal statement with respect to him when I was discussing the pay-increase bills, because I will say that the Senator from Delaware has saved the Government millions of dollars by his constant objection to such bills on the calendar and otherwise.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, the committee has approved $27,700,000 for administrative expenses of the Farmers Home Administration, which is an increase of $1,551,000 over 1950 appropriations. The House committee stated, on page 141 of its report, as follows:

> This increase will permit the Department to put the farm-housing program authorized on a part-year basis in 1950 on a full-year basis in 1951, and will cover increased pay costs. In addition, it will provide approximately $300,000 for servicing insured mortgages made in prior years and for handling the additional farm-tenant and water-facilities loans authorized for 1951.

We are not proposing that we should go back to the appropriation for the year 1949 and 1950. We are perfectly willing to have the appropriation go forward by a million and a half beyond that. The House says that is sufficient to provide for the extra work. We simply do not want to go up $2,800,000.

I point out that if we approve a $29,000,000 appropriation for administration, that will represent administrative costs of 18 percent of the moneys disbursed and loaned by the Farmers Home Administration. They are disbursing and lending something over $166,000,000, and here there is recommended $29,000,000 for administration, which represents an administrative cost of 18 percent. I submit that is a rather high administrative ratio, particularly when, as the Senator from Georgia has correctly pointed out, at least half of the outlays are for loans, not direct appropriations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee on page 216, line 2.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask for a division.

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Extension Service—Payments to States, Hawaii, Alaska, and Puerto Rico," on page 217, line 25, after the word "and," to strike out "section 3 of the act approved June 20, 1936 (7 U. S. C. 343c), extending the benefits of the Capper-Ketcham Act to the Territory of Alaska, $10,000" and insert "the act approved October 27, 1949 (Public Law 417), extending to the Territory of Alaska the benefits of the Capper-Ketcham Act and sections 21 and 23 of title II of the Bankhead-Jones Act, $42,150; Puerto Rico, section 3 of the act of March 4, 1931 (7 U. S. C. 386f), authorizing extension of the Capper-Ketcham Act to Puerto Rico, $31,348"; in line 12, after the figures "$408,000," to insert "and the act approved October 26, 1949 (Public Law 406), extending the benefits of section 23 of title II of the Bankhead-Jones Act to Puerto Rico, $40,000"; and in line 17, after the name "Puerto Rico", to strike out "$27,000,000" and insert "$27,103,498."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Salaries and expenses," on page 218, line 24, after the word "possessions," to strike out "$900,000" and insert "$915,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the Secretary," on page 219, line 11, after the word "Agriculture", to strike out "$2,143,300" and insert "$2,179,300."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was under the subhead "Office of the Solicitor," on page 220, line 6, after the word "service", to strike out "$2,450,000" and insert "$2,675,000"; and in the same line, after the amendment just above stated, to insert "together with such amounts from other appropriations or authorizations as are provided in the schedules in the budget for the current fiscal year for such expenses which several amounts not exceeding a total of $207,000 shall be transferred to and made a part of this appropriation."

Mr. DOUGLAS. This is not an appropriation for persons giving direct service to agriculture. It is an appropriation for lawyers in the Department of Agriculture. In 1950 the appropriations for legal services in the Office of the Solicitor were $2,364,000. The House upped that to $2,450,000, an increase of $86,000. The Senate committee is now proposing an appropriation of $2,675,000, which is an increase of over $300,000 compared with the appropriation for the current year. There is the further provision that there shall be added to this sum for legal services other appropriations or authorizations provided for in various other items in the bill.

The legal profession is a very valuable profession, but it seems to me that economy can be made on the legal staffs in virtually every governmental bureau in Washington. Washington is well known for being top heavy with lawyers, and the departments are top heavy with lawyers. This is one place where we can effect a reduction without impairing service in the slightest.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Has the Senator from Illinois made investigation to determine how much of this additional $250,000 or $300,000 increase is for the use of law libraries? It is inconceivable to me that a request of that kind should be made, because in every section of the United States, in every city of any consequence or in every country of any consequence there are public law libraries.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not know. I cannot believe, however, that that is an item which is of any significance in the total. I believe the principal amount must be for the payment of lawyers.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. The Senator from Illinois understands, does he not, that it takes a great many lawyers to find the proper interpretation for acts of the Congress which will be entirely satisfactory to the head of the Department that employs the lawyers. Being sure of that on my own part, I will gladly support the proposal of the Senator from Illinois to kill this amendment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Vermont has again and again, I think very properly, called the attention of the Senate and the country to the fact that increasingly the heads of departments, instead of asking for legal opinions from the Attorney General, ask for legal opinions from their own legal departments, and then these legal departments solemnly give opinions satisfactory to their chiefs.

The Senator from Vermont has pointed that out again and again, and I quite agree with him in that respect. I am delighted that he reinforces my proposal.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I think I pointed out that for the year 1948 the Attorney General's office, which is supposed to intepret laws which are not clear to the agencies which are concerned, gave only 33 formal opinions on laws to all the agencies of the Government. The other interpretations, or "misinterpretations" perhaps would be a better word, for some of them anyway, were made by solicitors in the offices of the various agencies, and, of course, the solicitors and their staffs, being responsible to the heads of the agencies for their jobs, do the best they can to bring forth interpretations which will be satisfactory to the heads of the agencies which employ them.

One of the greatest weaknesses of our Government today is the great amount of employment and money expended on these solicitors' offices, which spend so much time in finding ways of getting around the intent of the Congress.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I realize it is always very popular to jump on the lawyers in the Government.

Mr. AIKEN. No, no, Mr. President; I was not jumping on the lawyers. I was jumping on the heads of the departments who insist that the lawyers bring in the interpretations they want.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am impressed by the fact that in every revolution the first persons who are in danger are the lawyers. When Jack Cade delivered his famous address to his men at Cheapside, he told them how he was going to bring it about so that they could buy a 3-penny glass of ale for half a penny, and a 4-penny loaf of bread for 1 penny, and one of his men said, in referring to the revolution, that "the first thing we will do is to kill off all the lawyers." Much of that same spirit seems to have come down from the days of Jack Cade's rebellion.

It is not a question of securing lawyers for the Department of Agriculture. The increase was not put in the bill arbitrarily and capriciously to give Mr. Brannan some high-powered gentleman who could twist the laws around to his liking. It was put in the bill in the hope that we would be able to have a sane lending program in connection with the telephone legislation which was passed last year and the housing legislation which was passed last year, which greatly adds to the legal duties of the Department of Agriculture.

The Department is going to lend a great deal of money under those two bills. It is going to lend $40,000,000 for housing, and $30,000,000 is contained in the act dealing with the rural telephone program.

In addition innumerable cases are arising by virtue of the imposition of acreage allotments and marketing quotas in the case of some commodities, and the plans we have been compelled to make for adjustments on other crops next year. Of course, if this war continues I imagine all acreage allotments and marketing quotas will go out the window, because the farmers will be requested to produce a great deal more.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. The Senator from Georgia realizes, does he not, that if acreage allotments and quotas go out the window probably twice as many lawyers will be required to enforce the price ceilings on farm commodities.

Mr. RUSSELL. That will not be a matter which will be dealt with in the Department of Agriculture. If that must be dealt with we will have a Mr. Henderson or someone else to handle it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The subcommittee took proof as to all these matters, did it not?

Mr. RUSSELL. The subcommittee did, yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The bill was reported after the most careful investigation and after extensive proof, and after careful consultation both in the subcommittee and in the full committee. Is it not reasonable to suppose that what was done in the subcommittee and in the full committee is a better way of legislating than simply to take the offhand opinion of one of our own Members on the floor?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that the committee reported this item $395,000 below the budget. Some Senators have been talking about a 10-percent cut. Here is a case where more than a 10-percent reduction was applied to the budget estimate. I believe it would be a short-sighted policy to defeat this amendment, involving as it does about $207,000, when the money is absolutely necessary to any sane and sensible administration of the telephone loan program and of the farm-housing program. Senators can strike it out of the bill if they will, but I unhesitatingly predict that in the long run such action will mean much greater losses to the National Treasury in connection with these two important lending programs which were authorized last year.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. The side slip does not state the number of lawyers that should be hired. Does the Senator know, from the evidence, the number of lawyers proposed to be employed?

Mr. RUSSELL. I can find how many the Department wanted to employ. I do not know how many the Department will hire with this money, because we applied a rule of thumb and hoped this modest increase would be sufficient to enable the Department to avoid great loss in connection with the telephone loan program and the housing program. We have the figures requested by the Department, but it is impossible for me to carry them all in my mind. They requested 125 lawyers. That is the number they would employ if they were allowed the entire six-hundred-thousand-odd dollars requested. I imagine the amount the committee allowed would, on the original basis, probably mean the employment of 35 or 40 lawyers.

Mr. FERGUSON. Does not the Senator feel that such a number of lawyers is altogether too many simply to interpret the provisions of three or four statutes? Could not such interpretation be made in the local office?

Mr. RUSSELL. This appropriation is for the local office.

Mr. FERGUSON. That is what I understood. Does not the Senator feel that 40 lawyers are too many to be employed simply to interpret three or four laws?

Mr. RUSSELL. I think if they can get by with respect to the Telephone Loan Act with 40 lawyers it will be an achievement to be hailed throughout the country. If a private enterprise were to embark on a program of that kind, which is supposed to expand from year to year and will involve the lending of probably $2,000,000,000 of Government funds, they would undoubtedly employ more than 40 lawyers, and each lawyer would be paid three times the salary scale provided for the Government lawyers. If some gigantic organization were getting ready to embark on a program of the same kind it would certainly need more lawyers than are proposed to be hired by the Government.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. I agree that they would be paid more money, but I do not think any firm would hire 40 lawyers.

Mr. RUSSELL. Many a firm would have more than 40 lawyers.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. YOUNG. I, too, was of the impression a few years ago that the lawyers in the Department of Agriculture did not work very much. However, last year and the year before I had many occasions to deal with the Department in connection with the REA program. I then found that the lawyers in the Department of Agriculture are among the hardest-working employees of the Government. I have known them to work Saturdays and Sundays, in order to develop programs for my own State.

Mr. FERGUSON. Were they working on programs or on propaganda?

Mr. YOUNG. They were working on the strictly legal aspects of the REA in my own State. I had a lawyer friend from North Dakota working with them, so I know whereof I speak.

Mr. FERGUSON. I am glad to hear that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KERR in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 220, in line 6. [Putting the question.]

The "ayes" appear to have it.

Mr. FERGUSON. I ask for a division.

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of Information," on page 221, line 19, after the figures "$611,128", to insert a colon and the following proviso: "Provided, That when and to the extent that in the judgment of the Secretary agricultural exhibits and motion and sound pictures relating to the authorized programs of the various agencies of the Department can be more advantageously prepared, displayed, or distributed by the Office of Information, as the central agency of the Department therefor, additional funds not exceeding $300,000 for these purposes may be transferred to and made a part of this appropriation, from the funds applicable, and shall be available for the objects specified herein."

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of this amendment? I understand that it provides for an additional $300,000 for sound pictures which will set forth and propagandize the programs of the various agencies of the Department of Agriculture. I, for one, would like to have an explanation of this amendment, and I should like to know its source.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the language to which the Senator adverts, which I believe is to be found on page 221, beginning in line 19——

Mr. AIKEN. That is correct.

Mr. RUSSELL. That language has previously appeared in the appropriation bill. It was submitted by the Bureau of the Budget this year. It was then approved by the House Committee on Appropriations, but was stricken from the bill when the bill was being dealt with on the floor of the House of Representatives. That action was taken on a point of order.

The amendment was voted by the Senate Appropriations Committee to be restored to the bill, in view of the statement to the committee by the Department of Agriculture, which I shall read:

> The purpose of this language is to facilitate financing the production and distribution of motion pictures for bureaus in the Department by the existing and authorized facilities in the Office of Information. The authority of the Department to produce motion pictures, in furtherance of the purposes of the Organic Act of 1862 (5 U. S. C. 511) has long been recognized and the Department has provided them since 1912. They are used mainly by the Extension Service as education and demonstrational aids.
> The authority to transfer contained in this language was inserted in the Agriculture Appropriation Act of 1943. While essentially the same result can be accomplished under the reimbursement authority of section 601 of the Economy Act, the above provision permits a merger of transferred funds, in the interests of simpler accounting.

Mr. AIKEN. But has the amount been used in other years?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on this point?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. Let me say that one of the best of all sound motion pictures developed by the Department of Agriculture is one which deals with the preservation of agricultural products in canning work and in the preservation of fruits. I am sure the Senator from Vermont is familiar with some of those motion pictures. Their great advantage is that instead of requiring a home demonstration agent to go from house to house and to set up the demonstration in each house, films are now available to show how these facilities can be used in the deep-freeze units—an extremely fine demonstration of what to do in the home canning of fruits and vegetables.

I think the sound film developed on the canning of fruits and vegetables alone is worth all the money which has been used for this purpose.

Mr. AIKEN. But if there already is a provision of $1,265,800 for this purpose, is the Secretary of Agriculture to be given authority to exercise his own judgment in the spending of an additional $300,000 for the production of motion and sound pictures relating to the authorized programs of the various agencies of the Department? Why do we have the appropriation in two places? Why do we provide that the $300,000 can be taken from some other fund if the Secretary of Agriculture desires to use it in the production of motion and sound pictures which will set forth the work of any agency of the Department which he may choose to have set forth?

The amendment almost gives the Secretary of Agriculture unlimited authority to produce the kind of motion picture or sound picture he wishes o have produced, so long as it has some relationship to the work of one of the agencies of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at this point?

Mr. AIKEN. Certainly; but first let me say that I am particularly concerned with this amendment, and perhaps the Senator from New Mexico knows why.

Mr. ANDERSON. I can only say to my good friend, the Senator from Vermont, that I do not know why the matter is handled in this fashion. I was only attempting to reply to the question as to whether or not sound films and motion pictures demonstrating the work of the Department have heretofore been used.

I say that in my opinion the expenditure of money for films heretofore prepared has been a very good expenditure.

Mr. AIKEN. The Senator from New Mexico is entirely correct. If properly used, a reasonable amount of money well spent would return good dividends on the investment.

However, I see no restriction on the Secretary of Agriculture in regard to the use of this $300,000 to produce the kind of film he may wish to have produced, so long as it relates to some phase of the work of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Can the Senator say whether any division of the Department of Agriculture which under the agricultural appropriation has any money to spend in relation to authorized programs of the various agencies of the Department, could transfer all that money to this particular agency and have it do all the work and handle all the program?

Mr. AIKEN. I would rather have the Senator from Georgia answer that question. As I read the law, it seems to me that $300,000 would be taken out of the $1,265,800. Or could it come from any unused funds of the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. RUSSELL. No; the $300,000 is very similar to the appropriation for the Office of the Secretary. As the Senator is aware, there go into the Office of the Secretary various allotments from various bureaus and agencies within the Department of Agriculture, for the purpose of supervision of the work within that agency. I think the $300,000 is in addition to the appropriation referred to by the Senator, and I think it can be transferred from funds which are appropriated for the various branches of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. FERGUSON. But not necessarily under the Office of Information? That is the idea, is it not?

Mr. RUSSELL. It has to be spent under the Office of Information.

Mr. FERGUSON. But it can come from any other agency of the Department of Agriculture; can it not?

Mr. RUSSELL. Oh, yes; there is no question about that.

So, as I understand this $300,000, it comes by transfer from any agency of the Department. For example, I think the Commodity Credit Corporation, if it has any funds available for this purpose, can transfer them so as to have a film made to show farmers how to store corn in home storage; and the money could also be used for the distribution of that film.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Could the money also be used to show the advantages or disadvantages of the Brannan plan? It could be used for that purpose, could it not?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, if the Senator from Vermont will permit me to reply, let me say that I do not think the money could be used for that purpose at all. If I thought it could be used for that purpose, I certainly would not approve of this amendment. However, I do not think the money could be used for such a purpose, because the amendment states that the funds may be used for "authorized programs."

Up to this good moment, the Congress of the United States has not authorized the Brannan plan.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Michigan that I think I agree with the Senator from Georgia that the money could not legally be used to promote a new program. But the money could be used for the production of a sound or motion picture to show how the American farmer in recent years has attained salvation under the programs of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Marketing is a part of the Brannan plan, is it not? Distribution is a part of the Brannan plan, and both are recognized in other sections relating to the marketing of farm products. Does not the Senator think that the funds could be used for that purpose, and, therefore, to demonstrate the values of the Brannan plan?

Mr. AIKEN. The Senator from Michigan believes, as I do, that certain funds appropriated to the Department of Agriculture have already been used—or misused—for the promotion of the Brannan plan.

There is no guaranty that, if Commodity Credit or PMA funds have been used for that purpose, this $300,000 movie or sound film could not also be used at least promote enthusiasm, to show that while we are doing pretty well under the present programs, we might do even better.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Senator is familiar with the recent program in Minnesota, under which some $34,000 or perhaps as much as $50,000 was used in behalf of the Brannan plan, even though not authorized. The Senator has no doubt as to that fact, has he?

Mr. AIKEN. I also pointed out recently, when the Senator from Michigan was absent from the Senate Chamber, that the Comptroller General never ruled on the point raised by the Senator from Michigan, namely, that the Secretary of Agriculture, at the meeting in Minnesota, violated the law by making a speech in favor of the Brannan plan. The Comptroller General held that it was a matter which would properly come before the Department of Justice, not before the Comptroller General.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is the Senator from Vermont familiar with the statement I made previously on the floor of the Senate, in which I showed that the Secretary of Agriculture had pointed out to his top PMA men that in his opinion it was more important that they work toward the enactment of his legislative program than that they work to make the existing law function?

Mr. AIKEN. I believe the Senator from Delaware made some such statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I quoted a portion of a letter which the Secretary had written to his top officials, in which he had made that statement.

Mr. AIKEN. There is some indication that at least a few of them have borne that admonition in mind. It appears to me that this is definitely legislation on an appropriation bill, and I ask the Chair to rule on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair correctly understand that the Senator from Vermont is making the point of order?

Mr. AIKEN. I am making the point of order that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I should like to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. AIKEN. I may say that I am highly suspicious of this item of $300,000, which is to be used for the production of a sound or motion picture, as proposed. I make the point of order that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, it is a legislative matter, but it is an amendment to a legislative matter, because the language which precedes it, writing out all the numbers of the yearbooks which can be printed, is itself legislative. So it is an amendment to a legislative provision which comes to us in the House bill. We certainly have a right to amend a House legislative provision which comes to the Senate. When the House undertakes to write out and prescribe how many of the Yearbooks of Agriculture shall be printed for the use of the House and Senate, and to write in a great deal of legislation in connection with the Office of Information, the Senate has a right to amend it to the extent proposed, because when the House legislates, then the Senate has a right to legislate. The House provision, prescribing the number of yearbooks which can be printed, is purely legislative. That is one form of information. We come forward with another.

While I am about it, the distinguished Senator has talked about a sound film. This provision is not only for a sound film, but for preparing an agricultural exhibit to be taken around to State fairs and gatherings of that kind. It was not placed in the bill with any idea of promoting the Brannan plan—perish the thought, so far as our committee is concerned.

I do not know how the Members feel about it. I did not poll them. But this is a provision which has been in the bills since 1943. It is not a new idea to assist by means of the dissemination of information by way of agricultural exhibits, moving pictures, and otherwise. It has been in progress since 1943, and it is certainly not put in this bill with any idea of propagandizing for the Brannan plan. The Brannan plan was in existence before 1943. It was not called the Brannan plan. It bore the name then of a gentleman from Iowa or Illinois, some doctor from one of the agricultural college experiment stations in that area, who headed the movement as an emergency or a depression measure.

The Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Brannan, later pinned his name to the program evolved by this professor. But there is nothing about the Brannan plan in this amendment. I hope the Senator will not assail it on those grounds, because it does not relate to the Brannan plan.

Mr. AIKEN. I may say that the Senator from Vermont did not bring up the idea that this might be used for promoting the Brannan Plan. However, the Senator from Vermont is not satisfied with this provision. I should prefer, Mr. President, to make the point of order that the provision is not germane to the bill.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Is it not a fact that this identical language was stricken from the bill in the House, that a point of order was made against it, and that it was removed from the bill for that reason?

Mr. RUSSELL. That is exactly correct. But the House has an entirely different system from that of the Senate when it comes to dealing with points of order.

Mr. WHERRY. I understand that. But, unless there is something else about this amendment which is absolutely germane——

Mr. RUSSELL. Of course, it is germane.

Mr. WHERRY. Unless it amends the provision which came to the Senate from the House, it seems to me that it is not germane.

Mr. RUSSELL. It is a proposal to amend what the House sent to the Senate.

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct.

Mr. RUSSELL. What the House sent to the Senate was a provision for information, and this amendment relates to information. It provides for exhibits explaining new agricultural developments of major interest to farmers and is supplied to some 35 large State and interstate fairs which request this material each year. Technical assistance and production facilities are also extended to department agencies for the preparation of small exhibits, for limited use. In addition, the Office of Information provides motion picture, radio, and projection service for the Department and supervises the distribution of films from 72 cooperative State film libraries for the use of extension agencies.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. This amendment goes far beyond the provisions sent to the Senate by the House. In fact, it authorizes the Secretary to use his own judgment as to whether or not $300,000 worth of sound or motion-picture film would promote the work of the Department.

Mr. RUSSELL. Upon whose judgment are we going to have to depend for information?

Mr. AIKEN. I ask for the judgment of the Senate upon the point of order.

Mr. CHAVEZ and Mr. LUCAS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield first to the Senator from New Mexico, after which I shall yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CHAVEZ. The language sought to be employed is that which has to do with information.

Mr. RUSSELL. That is correct.

Mr. CHAVEZ. It happens that what the House did was to provide for information in the form of yearbooks. The yearbook contains possibly a thousand items of information beneficial to the farmer. Am I correct?

Mr. RUSSELL. Of course.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Besides the items outlined in the yearbook, giving sound information to the farmer, the Senate amendment provides only for additional information, but, nevertheless, information. Is that not correct?

Mr. RUSSELL. That is correct. There can be no question about the germaneness of the amendment. The item is as follows:

> For necessary expenses in connection with the publication, indexing, illustration, and distribution of bulletins, documents, and reports, the preparation, distribution, and display of agricultural motion and sound pictures, and exhibits, and the coordination of informational work in the Department.

It goes on to provide for the publication of 230,850 copies of the yearbook for the use of the House and the Senate, which is certainly legislation. Then comes the amendment which provides for additional information dealing with agriculture, to be furnished by the transfer of $300,000 from other appropriations. Then follows this legislation:

> That in the preparation of motion pictures or exhibits by the Department, not exceeding a total of $10,000 to be used for employment pursuant to the second sentence of section 706 (a) of the Organic Act of 1944—

And so forth. That is legislation. The whole section is legislation.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Georgia has just read into the RECORD what I had intended to read, under the general caption of "Office of Information." Everything which he has read, it seems to me, is right in line with what the proviso does. It deals with the same subject matter, and it seems to me it is all absolutely germane.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. The point on which the House sustained the point of order, however, was that the $300,000 was to be transferred from other bureaus within the Department of Agriculture, in addition to the amount of money allocated for the purposes which the Senator just mentioned. It seems to me it is new legislation, and that the House was correct in striking it out.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not intend to pass on the rules of the House, because from what little experience I have had I know that they are widely different from the rules of the Senate. Limitations are not out of order in the House. In the Senate it has been held that all limitations are out of order. There is no similarity of rules as between the House and the Senate in dealing with appropriation bills. I claim, and shall continue to insist so long as I am a Member of the Senate, that when the House legislates one line, as it does when it spells out the number of yearbooks to be printed, it has opened the door, and the Senate can legislate on the subject even in an appropriation bill.

Mr. WHERRY. I agree with the distinguished Senator in that respect, but I make the point that that was not the issue in the House. It was not on the question of whether it was germane to the Office of Information; it was that the $300,000 was to be transferred within the Department for the purposes outlined. It was on that question that the point of order was made. I submit that if the Senate attempts to write it into the bill under the theory that it is amending what the House did, a point of order can properly be made.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not agree at all with the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the amendment provides that—

> Not exceeding $300,000 for these purposes may be transferred to and made a part of this appropriation, from the funds applicable, and shall be available for the objects specified herein.

The amendment could not be more germane.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McFARLAND. Is a point of order debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not debatable.

Mr. McFARLAND. I insist on the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia has raised the question of germaneness of the Senate amendment, which has just been discussed, to the bill as passed by the House.

Under rule XVI, paragraph 4, the Chair will submit the question of germaneness to the Senate, which, under the rule, is not debatable.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, if the Senate is anxious to have a vote on this question tonight, the junior Senator from Nebraska will suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hickenlooper	Millikin
Anderson	Hill	Morse
Brewster	Holland	Murray

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

The question is, Is the committee amendment before the Senate germane to the House provision? The question is submitted to the Senate.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHERRY. The rule provides that no further point of order can be made and that the question of germaneness must be settled by a vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Two questions are involved. One is the question of new legislation. Where new legislation is proposed by a committee, the Senate may decide that it is germane to the provision in a House bill. In that case the point of order on the ground that it is new legislation no longer lies.

Mr. WHERRY. In other words, if the Senate decides that the language is germane, the point of order is actually settled by the vote on the question of germaneness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senate decides it is germane, of course it can vote on the question of agreeing to the amendment separately. However, the point of order that it is new legislation is then disposed of.

Mr. TAFT. A point of inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TAFT. Germane to what? Germane to the bill? Germane to the provision of the House bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Germane to the House language, to which it is an amendment.

The Senator from Georgia, in charge of the bill in reply to the point of order that it was new legislation, contended that it was germane to the provision of the bill to which it is an amendment, which is the House language.

Mr. WHERRY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHERRY. Was the point of order raised to the question of germaneness or on the ground of new legislation?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order was made against the amendment on the ground that it was new legislation, and the Senator from Georgia, to counter that point of order, said that it was germane to the legislative provision in the House text.

Mr. WHERRY. I did not hear the Senator from Georgia raise the question of germaneness, and the point of order was not debatable, so how was it raised?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present occupant of the chair was temporarily called out at the time the point was raised, but the Chair understands that when the point of order was raised against the language on the ground that it was new legislation, the Senator from Georgia contended that it was germane to the House provision, and that raised the question, and the occupant of the chair at that time submitted the question to the Senate, and the point of no quorum was made. That is the present situation.

The question is, Is the amendment germane to the House language?

Mr. WHERRY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Those who take the position that the language of the committee amendment is germane to the House language will vote "yea." Those who take the contrary position will vote "nay."

The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this vote the yeas are 35, the nays are 25, the Senate holds the amendment germane, and that settles the point of order on the ground that it is new legislation.

COMMUNISTS IN GOVERNMENT SERVICE—REPORT OF MAJORITY MEMBERS OF SUBCOMMITTEE OF FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE

Mr LODGE. Mr. President, the report of the majority members of the Tydings subcommittee which is just out, not having gone through the Foreign Relations Committee, asserts that I was absent for 9 of the 31 sessions of the meetings of the subcommittee, that for this reason the subcommittee was "burdened in its work" and that there was significance in most of these absences coming during consideration of the Amerasia case.

The truth is that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], who is one of the majority signers of the report, missed five meetings—five of the nine—as I did, because we were members of the subcommittee of two which was taking testimony in New York and abroad on the day-to-day policing of the loyalty program pursuant to a unanimous vote of the full subcommittee. This was between the date of May 26 and June 5 when most of the consideration of the Amerasia case occurred. I missed the other four meetings because a young man who was a close friend of my son's, of myself, and of my whole family, was drowned near my home in Massachusetts and I was preoccupied for several days with many things pertaining to the tragedy. This occurred in March just as the subcommittee was beginning its hearings and could have had no possible effect, burdensome or otherwise, on the work of the subcommittee.

It is a pity—and it is foreign to all the usual courtesies between Senators—that I should be criticized by name for being absent on official committee work and, secondly, for being absent because of the death of a close and beloved friend.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey and Mr. HICKENLOOPER addressed the Chair.

Mr. LODGE. I shall be glad to yield in a moment when I have completed my statement.

It is this type of petty sniping—this attempt to hit below the belt—which has made the work of the subcommittee so difficult. If the other statements in the majority's report are no more accurate than these statements about myself, the report will be chiefly valuable as fiction and as special pleading, rather than as fact. Indeed this makes the whole document suspect.

The majority report also attacks me by name for reading 12 of the 81 loyalty files. Twelve files taken at random and requiring five whole days to read, are a representative cross-section and convinced me that the files were in such an unfinished, undeveloped state as not to provide a sound basis for reaching conclusions. It is noteworthy that, while the majority criticizes me for refusing to accept these files blindly at their face value, nowhere in the majority report are these files discussed as individual cases, one by one the way I do. There is merely a blanket endorsement, and there is no way of knowing whether the majority read 81 files or none at all. My report goes into specific details.

Mr. President, in my minority views, I purposely made no personal attacks on any members of the subcommittee and, at this serious moment in history, I shall not do so, but it is necessary that I clarify the flagrant misstatements which the majority have seen fit to make about my part personally in this investigation. They must be indeed desperate men to use these personal methods to divert attention from the main issue which, of course, is the total inadequacy of their investigation.

I now yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question. As I recall the history of this investigation, the resolution adopted by the Senate authorized the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to investigate the matter and to report to the Senate. Am I to understand that the subcommittee, which was designated to investigate and report to the full Foreign Relations Committee, has released a report to the press purporting to be the report of the full committee?

Mr. LODGE. Yes. It is an unusual proceeding, though, since the subcommittee should have reported to the full Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. As a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, I must utter a vigorous protest against that procedure. I have never heard of it before. The subcommittee was appointed to report to the full committee, and the full committee was to consider it before any public report was made.

Mr. LODGE. I think that is correct. I think it is a most unusual procedure. I know of no reason for taking this unusual procedure and ignoring in rather cavalier fashion all the other members of the committee.

I now yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from Massachusetts would tell me when he managed to obtain a copy of this report of the subcommittee, that is of the majority members of the subcommittee of which I happen to be a minority member. I am curious about that.

Mr. LODGE. I got it this afternoon at about 4 o'clock. I went down into the sort of battle station they have down in the cellar. I went in and asked a young lady there to give me a copy of the report, which she did. Maybe she was not supposed to do so. Maybe I am not supposed to see it until it comes out in the newspapers tomorrow.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. For a considerable period of time, I may say to the Senator from Massachusetts, I have been obtaining my information about the subcommittee from the newspapers. I have been totally unable to secure a copy, galley proof, or otherwise, of this so-called report of the majority party membership on this subcommittee. I understand it was freely handed out to the newspapers this morning, and perhaps yesterday, and on last Friday at least one or two newspapermen, I am told, had access to the galley proof; and yet, as a member of the subcommittee, I was not provided with any such report. I understand that after some considerable inquiry on the part of my office this afternoon two copies were sent over late, after they had been pretty generally scattered around to the public.

I think it is a rather fantastic procedure, and I expect to have something to say about it when I can find out what the majority has said. One or two little things that have been quoted to me by the press certainly will lend themselves to a considerable amount of interesting comment.

Mr. LODGE. Let me say to the Senator from Iowa that we have a well-established procedure in the Senate, which has developed over the years as the result of experience; and whenever a little handful of Senators undertake to violate that procedure and bypass it, naturally and obviously it makes anything they do suspect.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Was it the understanding of the Senator from Massachusetts that this subcommittee, to which he and I both, at least on paper, belong, was to report to the Foreign Relations Committee as a creature of the Foreign Relations Committee, or was the subcommittee to broadcast its own specialized and very difficult-to-understand findings to the world before they were reported to the Foreign Relations Committee?

Mr. LODGE. My understanding is that the usual procedure is for the subcommittee to report to the full committee, and in this case that has been completely violated.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts further understand that assistant counsel for the subcommittee, Mr. Morris, who had no part in the preparation of it, not only was refused a copy of this report, but that at least until this morning, so far as I know, there has been a complete refusal on the part of the majority to pay Mr. Morris' expenses or anything else for the very vigorous investigative work he has done for a considerable time, from, as I recall, March or about that time?

Mr. LODGE. I did not know that. If the Senator from Iowa says it is so, of course I believe it.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I am informed that it is true; that his investigations were becoming a little bit too detailed and were producing too many possible witnesses for the subcommittee; that his activities gave offense to the majority, and they therefore decided to cut him off the expense account and refuse to pay his hotel bills and his travel expenses. So in connection with what investigation he did after that, up until now at least, I think he has advanced his own money: I wondered if the Senator from Massachusetts knew that.

Mr. LODGE. I did not happen to know that, but it does not surprise me, I will say.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Senator has indicated, in what he has had to say to the Senate, that a majority report has been issued.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. FERGUSON. Was that report submitted to all the members of the subcommittee so that a vote could be taken on the issue of that particular report?

Mr. LODGE. No. I am glad the Senator from Michigan asked me that question. I never saw the majority report until this afternoon when I went downstairs and asked a young lady to give it to me, and she did. So my statement of individual views, which is contained in the back part of the subcommittee report, was written completely without knowledge of what the majority were going to say, and I never had any chance to see what the majority were going to say until the thing was in print, and I only got it by the back door, it might be said.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. FERGUSON. Is it not customary when a subcommittee is going to make a report, and call it a majority report, that the subcommittee report is shown to all the members; that a meeting is called, and a vote is had on the report, and then if a majority of the votes are cast in favor of the report, it will be called a majority report? As I understand, that was not done.

Mr. LODGE. That was not done. No; that was never done at all.

Mr. FERGUSON and Mr. IVES addressed the Chair.

Mr. LODGE. I yield first to the Senator from Michigan and then I shall yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. FERGUSON. How, under any system of procedure followed in the Senate, can this so-called report be called a majority report of a subcommittee, no voting having ever been taken on the particular document?

Mr. LODGE. No vote was taken in the subcommittee, but three of the five members of the subcommittee have put their names to the report, and I imagine it will be called the majority report. But, of course, there never has been a vote in the subcommittee on this report, because the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] has never seen it at all, and I saw it just this afternoon at 2 o'clock.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, in order to clear the record, let me say that I saw it in the hands of a newspaperman in the President's room for a moment, about 30 minutes ago; but otherwise I have not seen it.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from New York has a copy of it, but I shall not ask him how he got it.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Does the Senator know by what authority the report has been printed at public expense as a majority report of the subcommittee, if it has never been voted upon?

Mr. LODGE. I am at a loss about that; I am puzzled to know how it happened.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. IVES. I should like to ask my distinguished friend the Senator from Massachusetts whether he feels that the report, by any construction which might be placed upon it, is a direct violation of the resolution by which the investigation is taking place.

I should like to read the resolution again, so the Senate can see just what has happened.

The resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to conduct a full and complete study and investigation as to whether persons who are disloyal to the United States are or have been employed by the Department of State. The committee—

It refers only to the full Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, not to the subcommittee—shall report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the results of its investigation, together with such recommendations as it may deem desirable, and if said recommendations are to include formal charges of disloyalty against any individual, then the committee, before making said recommendations, shall give said individual open hearings for the purpose of taking evidence or testimony on said charges. In the conduct of this study and investigation, the committee is directed to procure, by subpena, and examine the complete loyalty and employment files and records of all the Government employees in the Department of State and such other agencies against whom charges have been heard.

That is the end of the resolution; but again I inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts whether he feels that the intent and purpose of the direction contained in that resolution have been carried out in this instance.

Mr. LODGE. I make it a big point in my statement of individual views; I categorically demonstrate that the subcommittee has not done the job the Senate assigned to it.

Of course I agree wholeheartedly with those who contend that the subcommittee should come first to the full committee, as the prime figure in this whole matter.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. I wish to speak in my own time, Mr. President.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, that is all I care to say about this matter. I wish to set the RECORD straight in regard to the point about me.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I wish to say that of course I was not a member of the subcommittee, and I took no part in its deliberations.

The Committee on Foreign Relations meets tomorrow at 10 o'clock to hear the subcommittee as to this report. The chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] does not happen to be on the floor of the Senate at the moment; but he has stated to me that tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock—and I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will be there; he is a member of the subcommittee—the subcommittee will submit its report to the full committee.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. Is the Senator aware of the fact that this report has been released to the press or to a newspaper to be issued tomorrow morning?

Mr. CONNALLY. I have been informed of that. I did not release it to the press.

Mr. LODGE. No; I did not suppose the Senator from Texas had done so.

Mr. CONNALLY. But I have been informed that the release has been made.

Of course, Mr. President, we know that oftentimes releases are made several days ahead of time in order to get news coverage about a matter.

However, I do not think the Senator from Massachusetts had anything to do with releasing the report. I think he is entirely opposed to such practice.

Regardless of all that, let me say that tomorrow the full committee is to meet at 10 o'clock. As I construe the resolution, it means that the full committee will report to the Senate, and that is what the full committee intends to do.

Mr. President, that is a statement of the facts, without any denial of mine in regard to anything that has been said in this connection.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I never heard of this report until an hour or two ago; and then I asked about it, and a copy of the report was sent to my office, as I am informed.

Let me inquire how the subcommittee can make a report until the full committee has met.

Mr. CONNALLY. The full committee has met.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. But the subcommittee has not met——

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; it has.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I am told that not the entire subcommittee has met.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, yes; it did meet.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. But I have never seen the report until now.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from New Jersey says he has a copy of the report now.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. No. I say that I am told that a copy of the report is in my office. I asked for it about 2 hours ago. I insisted upon having it before it went to the press.

Mr. CONNALLY. The clerk of the committee states that copies have been sent to all the members——

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Because I requested that it be done, 2 hours ago, because I knew it would have to come to the full committee, for the committee to pass on it.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from New Jersey has a copy of the report now; does he not?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Yes—in my office.

Mr. CONNALLY. Then I hope the Senator will be at ease about it, for he has it.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I have not read it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have not either.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. But I do not understand how the report could be made, unless the full subcommittee acted on it.

Mr. CONNALLY. The subcommittee must have knowledge of it, because the Senator from Massachusetts has individual views of his own which are printed in this pamphlet.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I never saw the report——

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Massachusetts saw the one he signed; did he not?

Mr. LODGE. Of course I did; that almost goes without saying.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. LODGE. But until this afternoon I did not see the report signed by the three majority subcommittee members. That is the point the Senator from New Jersey is trying to make, and I think it is a very good point. I do not see why we are trying to debate it.

Mr. CONNALLY. According to my mathematics, three constitute a majority of five. That is my understanding of arithmetic. The Senator from New Jersey, who is a professor, certainly should know that three is more than two.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I agree with the Senator as to that; but I wish to say that when I am on a committee which is to receive a report from a subcommittee of five, all five of the members of the subcommittee should be present at the meeting with the full subcommittee to make the report. I point out that the two other members of the subcommittee were not consulted. Furthermore, I have been advised that the press was informed of this report before I had seen it.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from New Jersey says he is a member of the full committee. I am not complaining of that; we are glad to have him on the committee.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. However, my point is that as a member of the committee, I should have seen the report before it was given to the press.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, at any rate, I have stated the facts. Senators can draw their own conclusions.

I have stated that the committee will meet tomorrow at 10 o'clock. I hope the Senator from New Jersey will be there, with his usual perceptive ability and with a smile on his face.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I will be there.

Mr. CONNALLY. I hope so.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has said that he filed a separate report, in the nature of individual views. I wonder whether he submitted it to the other members of the full committee, before it was issued, so that the members of the full committee had a chance to see it first.

Mr. LODGE. The other members of the subcommittee had a chance to see it.

Mr. LUCAS. However, my point is that the Senator from New Jersey is complaining because the report of the majority of the subcommittee was not submitted to the full committee before it was issued to the press. I wonder whether the Senator from Massachusetts submitted his individual views to the full committee or to the subcommittee. I am wondering whether the Senator from Massachusetts, in filing his individual report, submitted it to a committee of five, in a special session called for that purpose?

Mr. LODGE. We never have had a vote in the subcommittee on either the report which is signed by the three Senators or on the views which I submitted. Neither of those documents was ever presented for a vote. The three Senators said, "We are going to make our report." I said, "I will make my report." I then turned in my report. I have been wondering for a long time whether the Members of the majority had a chance to see my report before they finished their report; I do not know. I never had a chance to see their report; that, I can assure the Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. I understand.

Mr. LODGE. Whether their report has been altered in the light of my report is something I do not know.

Mr. LUCAS. I am not talking about that. But, in view of the questions propounded by the Senator from New Jersey, who seems to be very much wrought up about the fact that the report was not submitted to the full committee, I was trying to ascertain whether the Senator's report was submitted to the full committee for action, or whether the report made by the Senator from Iowa was submitted to the full committee—or has he made a report?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. If I may say to the Senator from Illinois, the subcommittee did not come to a head, the way most subcommittees do, by having a meeting at which a document is presented, which is voted up or voted down. Of course, three is a larger number than two; I agree with the Senator from Texas about that.

Mr. LUCAS. I am glad the Senator agrees with that.

Mr. LODGE. But it is impossible to have a vote larger than two, unless there is a vote. The proceeding, in a way, began to peter out, to disintegrate. That is where we are now. All I could do was to make my own statement, and my statement is in the document, away in the back; but it is there. I wish the Senator from Illinois would agree with it. I think he would agree with a large part of it.

Mr. LUCAS. I am going to read it. I want to say the proceeding did not disintegrate, so far as the Senator from Massachusetts is concerned.

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. LUCAS. Because he filed a separate report. He apparently never asked the full committee to consider his own report, submitted for the purpose of overturning the action of the full committee.

Mr. LODGE. I argued my views for 5 months, every time there was a chance of doing so. I submitted my report early to the Senator from Maryland and the other members of the committee had plenty of time to see it if they wanted to, and could very well have signed their names to it had they wanted to. They did not want to. When the Senator from Illinois reads it he will see why they did not want to.

Mr. LUCAS. I understand. The Senator does not altogether disagree with a number of things which are in the majority report. It is my understanding that the Senator definitely found, for instance, that Lattimore was not a Communist. He also found that Service was not a Communist.

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. LUCAS. I think that is in the report.

Mr. LODGE. No. I think the Senator had better read what I had to say about those cases. It is not quite so simple as that.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator agrees with the majority of the subcommittee as to two of the alleged chief Communists does he not?

Mr. LODGE. No; that is not correct. If the Senator from Illinois wants to undertake to discuss what I think about this whole case, though it is a bit late, I shall be delighted to do so.

Mr. LUCAS. Please do not do that now.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator should certainly let me comment on what he said my views were. I know he is fair.

Mr. LUCAS. The report speaks for itself. I have merely been told that by someone. Perhaps I should not even have mentioned it. If it misinterprets in any way the Senator's attitude, I will simply withdraw it, to keep him from entering upon a long discussion, because the three majority members of the subcommittee, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCMAHON], and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], are not present. Frankly, perhaps, I should not have said that.

Mr. LODGE. I wonder where they are. [Laughter.]

GENERAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1951

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7786) making appropriations for the support of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment on page 221, beginning in line 19.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, this amendment had not been called to my attention until now. It is a quarter of seven. I should like further opportunity to examine it and study it. I wonder whether the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Georgia, would be willing to postpone the vote until tomorrow. The amendment reads:

Provided, That when and to the extent that in the judgment of the Secretary agricultural exhibits and motion and sound pictures relating to the authorized programs of the various agencies of the Department can be more advantageously prepared * * * by the Office of Information, * * * additional funds not exceeding $300,000 for these purposes may be transferred to and made a part of this appropriation, from the funds applicable, and shall be available for the objects specified herein:

The distinguished Senator from Georgia says that that is not an increase in the funds available for information, and that the amount can be used by the different departments. He has other arguments, including the argument that this amendment has been in the bill before. Nevertheless, Mr. President, the way it is framed, it seems to me that it can be used very well for a program like the Brannan plan. I have seen Department of Agriculture bulletins which are distinctly propaganda for the Brannan plan, and whether "authorized programs of the various agencies" includes programs simply authorized by Mr. Brannan and not authorized by Congress, I have no particular means of checking, without further investigation.

If the Senator is willing to defer action on the amendment, if after I examine all the Senator's arguments I find them sound I shall make no further request for delay tomorrow morning, and shall say nothing on the subject. But I should like the opportunity, if the Senator is willing, to go over the evidence until the first thing tomorrow morning.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I am always agreeable to any reasonable request, and it may be there is nothing unreasonable about the request of the Senator from Ohio. I am a little amazed that my distinguished friend from Ohio should have been 7 years discovering this horrible bugaboo under the bed. This language has been in agricultural appropriation bills for 7 years. It has been renewed. It has been before the Senate time and time again. It is not merely getting read now to jump forth, seize the Senate, and force the Brannan plan through. It has been in the bill for all these many years. I do not believe there is any reason for delaying action on the amendment.

Mr. TAFT. Possibly it is the language under which the Brannan plan has been printed and issued in booklet form by the Secretary of Agriculture. If so, then I want it to come out of the bill. That may not be true. I can only say to the Senator that it is now 10 minutes of 7. I should like, if he will grant me the privilege, to have the opportunity of looking into it somewhat further. It may be that I shall find that I am wrong. If so, I will yield fully to the Senator's views, the first thing in the morning.

Mr. RUSSELL. I should be willing to agree to any language which would protect us from an avalanche of propaganda for the Brannan plan. I should be perfectly willing to include a provision that the programs must be authorized by Congress. I think that that is the only logical construction that could be placed on the language. But if the Senator from Ohio wishes to study the matter through, tonight, and peruse it, I shall not object to letting it go over until tomorrow.

Mr. TAFT. I thank the Senator.

Mr. RUSSELL. I hope his good, sound judgment will bring him to the conclusion that he should vote for the amendment, and that he was in error in thinking the amendment was not germane.

Mr. TAFT. That was based on the fact that I had not thoroughly examined it. But it seemed to me that in the way the authorization was framed, it permitted the use of money for particular agricultural programs not primarily informational, but to be used as informational programs. The Senator assures me that that is not so; so possibly my thought as to its germaneness was wrong. But it seems to me that if the amendment does what has been indicated, then I shall not think it germane to a general appropriation of money for programs of information.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, in view of the fact that this amendment is going over until tomorrow, I think I should read this further paragraph from the testimony before the committee:

The authority to transfer, contained in this language, was inserted in the Agricultural Appropriation Act of 1943, and while essentially the same result can be accomplished under the reimbursement authority of section 601 of the Economy Act, the economy measure permits the transfer of funds in the interest of simplified accounting.

Really, there is authority under other laws for the transfer of these funds. This provision makes it simply a matter of bookkeeping. But I am perfectly willing to let the vote go over until tomorrow morning. I should like to have action on the other amendments completed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will go over until tomorrow.

The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Library," on page 222, after line 19, to strike out:

Not to exceed $12,000,000 of the funds appropriated in this title shall be available for travel expenses. Amounts available from appropriations contained in this title are hereby reduced by the total sum of $645,496, such amount to be carried to the surplus fund and covered into the Treasury immediately upon approval of this chapter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Title II—Corporations," on page 223, line 17, after the word "exceed", to strike out "$16,000,000" and insert "$16,350,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 224, line 3, after the word "discharge", to strike out "$170,515,131" and insert "$66,698,457."

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of that amendment? It seems to me to revert to the old method of keeping the Commodity Credit Corporation funds intact by canceling notes which the Corporation has given the Treasury. I recall that the General Accounting Office protested very vigorously against that kind of bookkeeping, because the losses of the Commodity Credit Corporation never appeared as a Government expenditure under such a method. While I realize that the Senate committee has cut the amount which the House had canceled from approximately $170,000,000, to approximately $66,000,000, and for that I am very grateful, I wonder if the Senator——

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator will rejoice and be exceedingly glad when he hears the explanation. The reason the sum was cut from $170,515,131 to $66,698,457 was because upon a reaudit it was found that the losses were that much less than the figure of $170,515,131. Therefore, the Government is really $103,816,674 better off than we thought it was as a result of the transactions of the Commodity Credit Corporation.

Mr. AIKEN. Is it the plan to wipe out losses of the Commodity Credit Corporation simply by canceling notes given to the Treasury?

Mr. RUSSELL. That is the only way in which we have ever handled it.

Mr. AIKEN. I know. As I pointed out, the General Accounting Office vigorously protested such methods. I shall not oppose the amendment tonight. I think I shall concentrate on the other amendment which has been under discussion and which is much more vulnerable.

Mr. RUSSELL. It has been found that approximately $103,000,000 worth of notes will be paid to the Treasury which we did not think would be paid, and the Government is $103,000,000 better off than appeared by the figures submitted.

Mr. AIKEN. The Senator from Vermont is very happy to learn that. He is almost ready to think the Commodity Credit Corporation did not need the $2,000,000,000 which we appropriated a while ago.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. Is it not a fact that at the price at which cotton was selling it looked as if there might be losses on the 1948 crop, but with the increase in the price of cotton all the losses were wiped out by the realization that the Commodity Credit Corporation could sell its stocks at more than they cost, and if they closed the pool and took in some cotton they would actually sustain a profit instead of a loss? That applies to corn, wheat, and many other commodities. These stocks are not nearly so extensive as some people calculated. I think some of the money recently appropriated will not be used. I made a calculation and figured that probably the Corporation will not need all of the $2,000,000,000. But the wise thing was to appropriate it, but the desire would be that it would never require that amount of money.

Mr. AIKEN. If we find the Commodity Credit Corporation does not require the $2,000,000,000, the impression made on the public with regard to the farm program would be much better if we rescinded that authorization.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I agree with the Senator from Georgia that from the standpoint of the taxpayers it makes no difference whether we pay for this program through cancellation of notes or through appropriations, but I think the Senator will agree with me that this cancellation of notes in appropriation bills does have the effect of hiding from the American people the true cost of the program.

Mr. RUSSELL. I cannot see that it does. An appropriation would be more widely publicized than would the cancellation, but I do not think it hides the facts from anyone who wishes to get the facts.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I agree that it does not exactly hide them, but it does not give the publicity to the cost of the program that would be given through a direct appropriation by Congress.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not think the use of the word "hide" was fortunate. If the appropriation were made for that purpose it probably would be a little more evident to the reader of a newspaper, but any person who went into the subject would find that on the cancellation theory it would be more widely recognized.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The reason I raised the point is because in one of the recent reports of the Secretary of Agriculture he pointed out the amount of money which Congress had appropriated for the Corporation since its inception in 1933. While he emphasized the amount of money which the Corporation had paid back into the Treasury, he failed to mention the $1,500,000,000 of note cancellations, nor did he mention the $2,000,000,000 which had automatically accrued to this Corporation under section 32 during the past 15 years, both of which were taxpayers' money. The inclusion of these items would make quite a difference in the ultimate answer as to the results of the program.

Mr. RUSSELL. That would make a difference, of course.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The so-called surpluses about which the Secretary of Agriculture has been boasting have been false and misleading. The Commodity Credit Corporation was never established with the thought of making money. No one thought it would make money. But the taxpayers have a right to know what losses are involved and that information has not been given them. I think the Senate should abandon this note-cancellation procedure and make direct appropriations. In that way the cost of the program would be evident to everyone.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator to say "several billions of dollars"?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think it is a false profit. When the ECA has to buy cotton and buys it from the Commodity Credit Corporation at the market price, it does not cost the Treasury of the United States a penny more than it would if it went on the open market and bought the cotton. That transaction resulted in a profit of more than $200,000,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not questioning the merits or demerits of the individual transaction. I directed a letter to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget and asked him if he would review the operations of the Corporation for the past 13 years and give me the net result, from the standpoint of the taxpayer, of the operations of the Commodity Credit Corporation since its inception. In his reply, which I have here, he said:

> In answer to your letter of February 1, 1949, the net loss sustained by the Commodity Credit Corporation from its organization on October 17, 1933, through December 31, 1948, was $2,145,930,367 plus the around $2,000,000,000 which it had received under section 32.

He went on to point out——

Mr. ANDERSON. A portion of that is for the subsidization of food, and has nothing to do with the farm program.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not breaking it down, but I am saying that the Corporation has not shown a profit. On the contrary, its loss is nearly $4,000,000,000 total.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I think it is as wrong as it can be to say that the Corporation has lost several billions of dollars, when we realize that the Congress of the United States voted that, instead of paying the full price of something, it could be taken, for convenience, from the funds of the Commodity Credit Corporation——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not questioning here the merits or the demerits of the program authorized by Congress, nor am I questioning the program. But I do question the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture in a bulletin, from which I quote, when he said:

> Incidentally, Commodity Credit Corporation shows a lifetime profit rather than a loss.

That statement is not true. There is no use of our trying to conceal the fact that these support programs do cost money, and I think the true facts should be made known to the American taxpayers.

I shall not oppose the amendment, because it is immaterial whether we cancel the notes or whether we authorize an appropriation, but I do think the true picture should be presented in the report by the Secretary of Agriculture, and I think legislation should be enacted to correct this unsound procedure.

Mr. ANDERSON. I subscribe to that statement fully. I think one of the tragedies of the whole system of reporting is that the Comptroller General can issue a report and say the loss has been $2,000,000,000 on this program. If that is saddled on the farmer, it is a serious thing. I agree with the Senator from Delaware that if we could segregate those things which were subsidy programs in furtherance of the decision of the Congress itself to handle it that way we would be better off.

A great deal of money was used in the campaign against the foot-and-mouth disease in Mexico. The Government could have done that by direct appropriation by Congress, or it could have done it by the use of Commodity Credit Corporation funds. The amounts which were used from Commodity Credit Corporation funds should not be charged to the farm program.

I agree with the Senator that it would be desirable to have a complete and well-rounded picture of the Commodity Credit Corporation. I think it would show that the cost of the farm program has been extremely low. I think that a great many things which have been charged against the Commodity Credit Corporation make it look as though the farm program has been extremely costly. Whatever the figure is, we ought to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely say that the Commodity Credit Corporation as a corporation under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture has cost the taxpayers around $4,000,000,000, according to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget. Perhaps that should not all be charged against the agricultural program. However, we do not have a breakdown of these items in view of the fact that we have never been able to get the books of the Commodity Credit Corporation. Without the books we do not know how we should assess these charges. The point I am raising is that the true cost of these programs would be clearer if Congress would get around to making a direct appropriation. The Secretary of Agriculture should come in and justify appropriations on the basis of the merits or demerits of the question involved. Then there would be no question in the mind of the committee, Congress, or the country as to what it is costing. Furthermore, I say that when the Secretary of Agriculture puts out a bulletin in which he says this Corporation, the Commodity Credit Corporation, has shown a lifetime profit, rather than a loss, that statement is not true.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 224, line 3.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Title IV—General provisions," on page 229, after line 5, to insert a new section as follows:

> SEC. 411. Of the funds appropriated in this chapter for travel expenses, $791,888 shall be carried to the surplus fund and covered into the Treasury on or before August 1, 1950; but such amount shall be credited toward any other reduction in amounts available for such travel expenses resulting from decreases in appropriations made by this act below the budget estimates.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I have heretofore sent an amendment to the desk relating to the Meat Inspection Service. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment has not been offered. The Senator does not need to request unanimous consent to withdraw it.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that motion so that I may ask a question of the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LUCAS. Very well.

Mr. WHERRY. I did not have an opportunity to read the Senator's amendment.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I submitted an amendment which would have provided $2,500 for a part-time veterinarian to inspect meat at the Seattle stockyards. I have the assurance of those who are familiar with this program that out of the three-thousand-two-hundred-some-odd inspectors we ought to be entitled to at least one inspector at the union stockyards in Seattle.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am not sure that the Senator should withdraw his amendment. I am of the opinion that if his amendment is a good amendment it should be carried to conference. The Seattle Union Stockyards deal primarily, so far as the inspection of cattle is concerned, with cattle on the hoof. It is not a question of meat grading. The city of Seattle takes care of that by ordinance. It has to do with this cattle which come into the country from Canada. Shipments from Canada into the United States are not covered by the interstate commerce provisions. It is upon that basis that the Department of Agriculture has refused to place an inspector in the union stockyards at Seattle. I do not think it would be wholly out of order for the Senator from Washington to press his amendment and, if successful, to have the Senate conferees carry it to conference. If that is desirable to the Senator from Washington, I think the provision for $2,500 should be voted on by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is not in order at this time. The amendment was ordered to be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I do not want to embarrass the subcommittee, because the chairman assured me that there would be sufficient meat inspectors to provide one for Seattle. I make the point that this involves an international program.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not know that there will be a sufficient number of meat inspectors to take care of all demands from all over the country. Certainly if there is a slaughtering proposition involved, or if it involves a packing house, the Senator from Washington is entitled to an inspector. It would not make any difference whether the cow came from Canada or from the moon. The Government would be responsible, of course. If it is a question of inspecting cattle on the hoof, it is an entirely different proposition. Certainly we are inspecting cattle which comes into the country from Mexico, and certainly the rule which applies to the border of Mexico should apply to the border at Canada.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Would the Senator be willing to take the amendment to conference?

Mr. RUSSELL. I would have no objection to taking it to conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington cannot offer his amendment now. It is not in order until all committee amendments have been disposed of.

UNJUSTIFIED INCREASES IN THE PRICE LEVEL

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to take 3 or 4 minutes on an extraneous subject matter. I ask unanimous consent to have the remarks I shall now make printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of the debate today on the appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a cartoon which appeared in this morning's Washington Post. The cartoon is by Herblock; and in a very real sense I think it constitutes the finest, most penetrating "speech" I have observed thus far on the entire economic problem which confronts the country. Even though the "speech" is in cartoon form, it says a great deal; it says something to which the American people and, particularly, the administration, should give heed.

I understand from newspaper reports that the President of the United States perhaps will make a statement later this week in regard to our economic problems. If the President does, I am sure the speech he makes will demonstrate very careful study and thought in regard to what in my opinion is a current economic crisis.

The cartoon to which I have referred shows Uncle Sam in the process of being fitted to a new pair of shoes. The salesman, however, has gotten his boxes mixed, obviously, because he is presenting to Uncle Sam one shoe which is marked "War footing"—and that is shown as a high shoe—and another shoe marked "Partial mobilization"—and that shoe is shown in the cartoon as an oxford, whereas the shoe that Uncle Sam is shown to have taken off is marked "Business as usual."

Mr. President, I wish to present very briefly to the Senate a price problem which is becoming a great emergency in the United States as the hours go by. Over the week end and during most of today I have been gathering information in regard to what is happening to the price structure in the United States. Certainly there is no scarcity of foodstuffs. For that matter, there is no scarcity of a large quantity of the items which the fear of a spreading war have caused to rise to a price level which can honestly be characterized as a profiteering price level.

I happen to be one who thinks it too bad that in a period of hysteria which is sweeping our country, caused by fears which apparently many consumers entertain as to the possible scarcity of goods, once again great economic forces are collecting blood money from the American people; yet that is what they are doing because of the great inflationary changes in the price level which are occurring in the United States.

For instance, Mr. President, let us consider meat. There is no scarcity of meat. There is ample meat in the storage houses of the United States today. Let the great meat packers justify if they can—but they cannot—the increases in meat prices which the meat packers are guilty of imposing upon the American people in the last few days. Mr. President, its is profiteering. It is the collection of blood money. It is a tariff imposed upon the American consumers because the fear of a spreading war is creeping into the minds of many American consumers.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield for a question.

Mr. MAYBANK. I was going to ask the Senator whether in his judgment there is any scarcity of eggs, either. Yet only recently the price of eggs has been raised 3 cents a dozen.

Mr. MORSE. There is no scarcity, so far as I can determine from such research as I have been able to conduct; and I intend to continue it on a personal basis until the Congress does what I think it should do.

So far as I can determine, there is no scarcity in the case of any of the foodstuffs which have been subjected to the unconscionable price increases which have occurred in the past few days.

Again, Mr. President, the explanation is simply that certain economic forces are taking advantage of the American consumers. In my judgment it is time we took action to stop the profiteering which already is characterizing the price structure.

I think the meat packers have something to answer for in connection with the increases in meat prices which are occurring in the United States. I hope the President will have something to say about that, if it is true—as I judge from the ticker—that he is going to make a statement on the over-all policy of the administration in regard to economic controls during this period of time.

Mr. President, in my judgment we have no right to sit here as a Congress and see the American consumers suffer the losses that this inflationary spiral, represented by the unconscionable increases in food prices during the last few days, is causing them at the present time. I think it is already a little late for the administration to be talking about imposing some reasonable checks which will have some power of restraint over the sources of supply of food. I think it is a little late for the administration to be taking such steps, but perhaps it is better to have it done late rather than not at all.

Mr. President, I do not like controls; but let us face the fact that we had better do some checking with respect to some of the basic commodities which determine the standard of living of our people. Let us realize that we must put in the stop now on the basic commodities—such as meat, for example. I think it is simply outrageous that the average housewife has been subjected to such price increases. For instance, this morning I received from my own State a report in regard to meat prices in Oregon. If we go into the matter, I think we shall find that there is a uniform national pattern, a jiggling up of the price structure on some of the basic food commodities. I think we must face the fact that we should establish some checks on a few of the basic commodities in the field of food.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. Yes, in a moment. After I yield to the Senator from South Carolina, I wish to say something about some other commodities, commodities outside the field of food.

I simply wish to say that it is no answer to talk about voluntary controls in the case of the basic commodities, Mr. President. Voluntary controls constitute a nice theory; but where are the voluntary controls? The meat packers certainly have it within their power to put some voluntary controls into operation. However, they have not done so. Perhaps after they get the prices up to an even more unconscionable level than the present price level, the meat packers may wish to try to stop us from doing what we should do in the interest of the people; at that time the meat packers may try to prevent such action by suggesting some voluntary controls. However, by that time we shall have to deal with a roll-back on prices, rather than a stabilization of the prices then existing—prices which, for example, the meat packers already will have gotten up.

Now I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon has said he does not like controls. Let me say that I do not like controls, either. Certainly I hope it will not be necessary to have a system of rationing.

I wish to say that I expect the Banking and Currency Committee to begin an investigation of price increases. As the Senator from Oregon knows, that committee is charged with the duty of making studies of all matters relating to prices. I have asked the committee to meet on Thursday, following the President's address on Wednesday to the Congress, and following his address on Wednesday night to the people. So our committee will be studying the price increases which have occurred in the last few days.

I hope it will not be necessary to have rationing. I have always been opposed to rationing.

However, I hope the American people will keep their heads clear and their feet on the ground, and will not be stampeded into hoarding sugar or other commodities—as has been reported recently in the newspapers—and I hope the producers of the various commodities will not attempt because of the tragedy occurring in Korea, to take advantage in the way the Senator from Oregon has discussed.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I have great confidence in the Senator from South Carolina and in the Banking and Currency Committee, and I am sure they will do what is desirable to be done on the basis of the facts presented to the committee. It is good news to hear that the Senator from South Carolina intends in his committee to proceed to investigate this matter, beginning next Thursday. However, I think it is time that a few of us on the floor of the Senate issued some warnings to the business forces in the United States which are taking advantage of the war situation by jacking up to unconscionable levels the prices of commodities which are not even scarce.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senator is quite correct.

Mr. MORSE. Certain business forces are attempting to take that step because they have control over the distribution of such commodities. For instance, this morning I talked to three butchers in Washington, D. C. They informed me that they cannot tell what their meat will cost them next week. One of them told me of the increases in the wholesale price of hams cited to him by his wholesaler since last week. Yet, as the Senator from South Carolina knows, there has been nothing to produce any scarcity in hams, nothing which would justify an increase in the price of hams in less than a week. There is only one word by which to describe that action, and it is a nasty word: It is the word "profiteering."

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senator is quite correct.

Mr. MORSE. It is profiteering at the expense of the fears of American mothers and fathers, and it is profiteering at the expense of the blood which is being shed by American boys in Korea.

Believe me, Mr. President, I am going to make my voice heard for a few minutes today on the floor of the Senate in opposition to that kind of unconscionable economic conduct on the part of any group within our citizenry—whether it be the meat packers or any others.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. Let me point out that even the price of bread has been raised 1 cent.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. YOUNG. It is good news to me that the increase in prices is not charged to the price-support program. In fact, if we had had a price-support program in regard to meat, I think we would not be faced with the situation confronting us today as far as meat is concerned.

There is not a surplus of meat today. In fact, the reason we have a scarcity of meat now is that there has been no assurance to the producers that they would be protected against extreme losses. As a result, many livestock producers, and particularly feeders, have either cut down their operations or gone out of business, fearing there would be an extreme price collapse. So we now have many who are out of business who ought to be in business. I think this is a case where lack of a support-price program is more responsible for this price increase than if we have had one.

Mr. MORSE. I should like to say, to my good friend from North Dakota that there is no scarcity in meat, as between last week and this week, which would justify the tremendous increase in the price of meat. That is, the over-all supply of meat to which the Senator from North Dakota has directed attention in no way justifies the increase in the price of meat on the part of wholesalers as compared with the prices last week and the prices being quoted this week. That cannot be justified, and it can be explained only by the fact that those who have control over the channels of distribution of meat are taking a profiteering advantage of the Korean war. I do not like it. I am glad to hear the Senator from South Carolina point out that as chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, he does not like it, and that he proposes to find out the causes for it.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one further question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. YOUNG. I think the question of unreasonable price rises is quite as objectionable to the producer, to the farmer, and to the feeder as it is to consumers. I think it is uncalled for and very objectionable from a long-range farmer viewpoint. Producers are always hurt by extreme price fluctuations.

Mr. MORSE. The Senator from North Dakota is absolutely right. If a poll were taken of the cattlemen, sheepmen, hog raisers, and other producers of livestock, they would express the same sort of resentment which the Senators from North Dakota, South Carolina, and Oregon are expressing this afternoon on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I desire to associate myself very strongly and sincerely with the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Oregon. I can see no justification whatever for the increase which has taken place in the price of meat and of certain other commodities. There certainly has been no substantial increase in the number of men and women in Armed Forces, or in the number of men and women in the consuming public who are interested in the purchase of meat. To me is is a clear case of a desire to take advantage of a situation, which should be the last thing to commend itself to patriotic Americans at this time.

Last Saturday, in two radio programs over many of the stations in New York I gave warning of the situation to which the distinguished Senator from Oregon has so clearly and appropriately referred, and I intend to continue to raise my voice until some remedy is found.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. MORSE. I will yield in a moment. I appreciate the supporting remarks of the Senator from New York. They do not surprise me at all, because his record of placing the interests of the average families of America uppermost speaks for itself, and what we are pleading for here this afternoon is deserved protection for the great consuming public of America.

I now yield to the senior Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, to some extent I wish to agree with the remarks which have been made by the distinguished Senator from Oregon. But I am wondering whether he has taken into consideration the psychology which has a great influence on the market, especially regarding such commodities as meat, which are so essential to our livelihood. In my State there are, of course, a great many farmers who buy cattle, who raise hogs, sheep, and so forth, for the market, from which we get our daily supplies. When those animals are ready for market, they must go to market; they cannot be held because the price does not suit the man who has prepared them for market. He must take what the market offers. The market has been rather high, not only lately, but all along, going back to a period during the war. For a long time we have not seen a low-price meat year. The continual flow which takes care of the markets in New York City, Chicago, and other great centers must come from the feed lots of America. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon whether he can give the farmers or feeders of my State any assurance that if they should sell the supply which is prepared for the market today, they could replace their stock at a price which would enable them to operate at a profit, when they sell it.

Mr. MORSE. Let me say to the Senator from Nebraska that the economic principles for which the junior Senator from Oregon is pleading, if adopted, could not possibly hurt the cattle producers, because, when I am simply asking for a check on profiteering prices, I am certainly not hurting the cattle producers but really proposing an economic principle which must be put into operation if they are going to be able even to stay in business. If profiteering prices are allowed to continue to soar, I know of nothing that can give greater assurance to depleting the plains of America of cattle on foot.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. In a moment. I desire to make clear that the first principle I have laid down—and I have three I wish to lay down, Mr. President—the first principle I have laid down is that in the field of foodstuffs there is no scarcity which would justify the great increases in prices of the past few days. The reason of the increases, in my judgment, must be attributed to the selfishness and greed of those who are responsible for that type of profiteering.

Before I lay down the second proposition, I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, we have here what I believe to be a perfect example of not having the Brannan law in effect. If we had had it, prices would be down. If we had it, the farmer would get at least the cost of production plus a reasonable profit. It is all right to stand here and complain, as some Senators are doing today, but when the Department of Agriculture tried to solve the problem, all we heard was scorn and ridicule. Today, the country is simply reaping the whirlwind of that situation.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I desire to apologize to the Senator from Oregon by reason of the fact that I was called from the Senate Chamber and did not hear the beginning of his speech. But I am wondering whether the Senator is now limiting his discussion solely to profiteering and the advance in prices of foodstuffs?

Mr. MORSE. No. That was merely my first proposition.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Then I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon a question. I am sure he is aware of what has been taking place in the cotton market and the finished goods market, including sheets and pillow cases and children's clothing. Will the Senator have something to say about the advance of prices in that field?

Mr. MORSE. Very briefly; but I shall surely have something to say about it.

The second proposition I desire to lay down, Mr. President, is that free competition will not operate to solve this price problem in a period of such national emergency as is now upon us, when such large sums of money are going to be spent necessarily for the purpose of diverting from the normal economic stream a large portion of our economic goods for war uses. Let me put it in this way: The moment a national emergency, such as this arises, it is impossible to have the ordinary economic laws of competition, supply, and demand operate successfully, because the conduct of the Government itself in purchasing for war purposes vast stores of economic goods for the prosecution of war places certain business interests in a position where, if they are not subjected to reasonable checks, they can profiteer and the consumer has to pay the bill. That goes to the type of goods, particularly, to which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] has referred, such as cotton goods, but more particularly housing goods, steel goods. Already we find, so I have been told by four contractors within the past few hours, that certain house fixtures and most steel products are already in the gray market, and many of them are in the black market. Already, in order to purchase some of these goods to complete housing projects, there must be a little bonus paid to get delivery, because the holders of those goods are already saying to contractors, "Well, we think all this is going to be needed by the Government, and we can make no promises on delivery." The conversation then indicates that if the contractor has a little "do-re-mi" to pay by way of a bonus—and it constitutes nothing more nor less than an economic bribe—he can get his steel products.

Again, Mr. President, let me say I am glad to know that the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency will go into this subject, because if it does it will find, I am satisfied, that what I have said is true, that in the clearly scare goods there is already a gray-market situation, and, in some places, a black-market situation.

The last premise I desire to lay down, Mr. President, is that the Congress itself has a great public duty to perform to proceed with speed in protecting our economic system from the type of damage that is being done by those who want to profiteer as the result of the Korean war situation. Their conduct is the best ammunition that could be supplied to the Communist forces the world around. I think one of the best evidences we could give as to the strength of self-government, as to the strength of our democratic processes, is for the Congress to proceed without delay to determine the minimum steps we need to take in order to check the rising spiral of inflation, and to eliminate the abuses of profiteering, as our answer to the Commuist forces in the world, to show that democracy can protect, as we all know it can if we do our job, the free-enterprise system from the type of unconscionable license to exploit that is being made use of by forces which at the present time are seeking to gain greedy, selfish advantage from the Korean war.

In closing, Mr. President, let me say that I realize that these remarks will be misinterpreted by some persons who will say "MORSE is for a return of all the wartime controls." That is not correct. I believe we should profit from the lessons of World War II in regard to controls. I believe we should recognize the fact that, while we do not need to go so far as we went in World War II, yet, if we are to check the profiteers, half a dozen or 8 or 10, at the least, of the basic products which are vital to maintaining a stabilized economy will have to be put under some reasonable Government regulation until this crisis is over. If we do not do that, Mr. President—and I am not one given to predictions—if we let this inflationary spiral climb higher, it will be a matter of only a few weeks at the most until the workers of the United States will demand a Nation-wide wage increase. A Nation-wide wage increase will cheapen further the American dollar and leave the workers not with more real money in their pockets, but with less real value. That is why I think we have a job to do on the home front to support the boys on the war front.

It was a great thing for General Cates to say, when bidding good-by to the shipload of marines which left San Francisco a few days ago, "You have a job to do"—I am not quoting his exact words, but his meaning—"and I am sending you over there to do that job as quickly as possible." We have a job here at home to do, Mr. President, to support those boys by seeing to it, in the first place, that they get the war matériel needed so that there may be saved lives which are being unnecessarily lost in Korea because of a lack of equipment. We have a job to do to keep our economy a sound free-enterprise economy. We shall have no sound free-enterprise economy if we cheapen the dollar further by unnecessary inflation and if we permit greedy and selfish interests to profiteer out of the Korean war.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The whole Executive Calendar has been gone over heretofore.

Mr. LUCAS. With respect to the nomination of the United States marshal for the northern district of California, I inquire what Senator is objecting to that?

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator from California asked that that nomination go over until he returned from California, and the Senator well knows why he is absent.

NOMINATIONS TO BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF EXPORT-IMPORT BANK

Mr. LUCAS. Very well. With respect to the Export-Import Bank nominations. there are four members, and the members of the Board of Directors are now serving, I understand, without pay. When can we get to the consideration of those nominations?

Mr. WHERRY. I have been asking unanimous consent that those nominations go over for the convenience of the distinguished junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE]. I have already talked with him, and have informed him that the nominations have been on the calendar since June 27 and that other Senators on this side of the aisle have come to me and said they would like to have the nominations considered and voted either up or down.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, from now on the junior Senator from Oregon will protect all his rights on the floor of the Senate, and he wants to make a statement in regard to the pending matter, so that there can be no misunderstanding as to his position.

Mr. LUCAS. Before the Senator starts, may I inquire as to how long he wishes to discuss the question?

Mr. MORSE. If I can have the Senator's attention 5 minutes——

Mr. LUCAS. I shall be glad to listen to the Senator longer than that.

Mr. MORSE. That is a great compliment.

Mr. LUCAS. I hope the Senator will limit himself to 5 minutes.

Mr. MORSE. I shall do my very best.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon is recognized.

Mr. MORSE. I wish to state my position on the parliamentary situation, because when I get to the substance of the matter——

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, may we have order? I am very much interested in these nominations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is attempting to get order. The Senate will be in order.

The Senator from Oregon may proceed.

Mr. MORSE. When I reach the discussion of the merits and demerits of the nominations, that will take quite a while, but for tonight I wish to say that these names have gone over, not for the accommodation of the junior Senator from Oregon, but for the accommodation of the committee. He thought that was the only fair thing to do for the committee, and he is very glad that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK] is on the floor, so that the record can be made perfectly straight in regard to this matter. I shall tell my side of the story, and then the Senator from South Carolina can correct me if he thinks correction is needed, or supplement my statement if he desires to give more information.

Mr. President, I did not know that these names were before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency. I take full responsibility for that lack of knowledge, because I think it must be presumed, although we know it is a physical impossibility, that each Member of the Senate is always on notice as to any nominations before any committee of the Senate. I did not know that these nominations were before the Committee on Banking and Currency until the day the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK] reported them to the Senate.

It so happened, as coincidences will, that it was not until the morning of the day when the Senator from South Carolina reported the nominations to the Senate as having the approval of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency that the Senator from Oregon received what he considers to be sufficient information about the Export-Import Bank to raise in his mind a serious question as to whether these nominations should be confirmed. Therefore the very day the Senator from South Carolina reported the nominations the Senator from Oregon went to the Senator from South Carolina, who was then getting ready to leave that evening, as I recall, for South Carolina, and told him that he would like to have a hearing before his committee on these nominations, and he would prefer to have it in executive session because he thought that until he had completed his investigation of what he considered to be some very questionable practices on the part of the Export-Import Bank discussion should be held in executive session.

The Senator from South Carolina was exceedingly kind and gracious to the Senator from Oregon, as he always is, and said, "Wayne, it is pretty much out of my hands. I am leaving for South Carolina tonight. If I had known about this, you may be certain you would have had a hearing before the committee. But when I get back from South Carolina I shall be glad to talk to you about it further in regard to any question you want to raise concerning these men, or the Export-Import Bank, but so far as their nominations being reported to the Senate is concerned, I do not see that there is anything improper about that at the present time."

I think the Senator will recall that my reply was to the effect that "I am not going to let these nominations go through the Senate without presenting what I believe to be the facts concerning them, and I would like to have the matter discussed in committee."

I then thought of the matter further, and prepared a resolution, which that day I submitted in the Senate in order to put the full committee on notice as to my intentions about this matter. That resolution I understand has been referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. It calls for an investigation on the part of the committee in regard to these nominations, and the practices and policies of the Export-Import Bank. I think the time to lock the stable door is before the horse gets out. I think the time for investigation is in advance of the confirmation of the nominations.

I have been exceedingly busy, the Senator from South Carolina has been busy, and the majority leader has been busy. I think I have been derelict in not immediately, on the return of the Senator from South Carolina, pressing him then for further inquiry into the matter. I did not until today. I went to the Senator from South Carolina today and told him that I would like to have these men brought before the Senate committee in executive session because I had some questions I wanted to ask them before I thought I would be in a position to vote for their confirmation.

There is one other fact, to make the record complete. While the Senator from South Carolina was away, the Senator from Illinois and I had a conversation in which I expressed my desire not to have these nominations come for consideration until the Senator from South Carolina could return and a hearing could be held. We had a little misunderstanding about it, which was completely the fault of the Senator from Oregon.

I received information on one occasion from clerks on this side of the Senate that the Senator from Illinois had brought the nominations up. I was advised by the Chair that I was mistaken about that, that they had come up in a routine manner. The Senator from Illinois will recall that at that time I told him I was in error, and apologized to him for it, but I still wanted a hearing on these nominations before they were presented to the Senate for confirmation.

Today the Senator from South Carolina told me—and I am sure he will not object to my recalling the conversation—that last Saturday the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Snyder, called him and urged upon him early action on these nominations, because these men had not been paid, as he said, for the past few weeks. I think that is right. I do not think they should be paid for any time at least until this matter is cleared up. I do not think they should be confirmed, on the basis of my present information.

This afternoon the minority leader, in a conversation with me, exactly as he has reported to the Senate, said that one of these nominations involved a man from Nebraska, and that he had accommodated me in regard to the matter, that henceforth however, on this matter, he would call for a quorum, that I would have to be here to protect my own interests, because he thought he was in a position where he might find it necessary to make a motion to consider the nominations. I told him that was perfectly all right, though I had hoped to carry on the discussion first in executive session in the committee.

The Senator from South Carolina advises me today that he must press for action on the nominations, I assume by motion, because it will not be done by unanimous consent unless I am caught napping off the floor. If they are brought up on motion, of course I shall vote against the motion, but if the motion is agreed to, I shall proceed to discuss the nominations in some detail.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield, or I will yield the floor.

Mr. MAYBANK. I merely want the record to show that when these nominations were reported on June 27, the Senator from Oregon spoke about the matter, and did make a statement. Insofar as Secretary Snyder is concerned, he called me last week and asked me about the nominations. I told him the Committee on Banking and Currency had reported them, that their consideration was a question for the majority leader to take up.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that these nominations were sent here on June 16, and I gave notice that Mr. Gaston's name had been sent to the Senate. I wrote to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN], and he talked to me, and I wrote to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. IVES], and I talked to him, and they spoke most highly of Mr. Gaston.

The next name was that of Mr. Hawthorne Arey, of Nebraska. The senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] and the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] are present. They spoke highly of Mr. Arey, and they were satisfied with his nomination.

The next name was that of Mr. Lynn U. Stambaugh, of North Dakota. The senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] and the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] approved the nomination as being that of an excellent man.

The next name was that of Clarence E. Gauss, of Connecticut. I conferred with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCMAHON] and the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON], and they spoke highly of Mr. Gauss.

From the 16th of June to the 27th not one letter, the clerk of the committee reported to me, was received against any of the nominees, nor was a hearing asked, or any protest made.

I am not here to defend these gentlemen, except as chairman of the committee to say that I took the nominations up with the Senators from the States from which they came, and there was not one unkind word said by the Senators from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER and Mr. WHERRY] or the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER]. The junior Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN] told me he expected to make a speech on the Gaston nomination, and the senior Senator from New York [Mr. IVES] said he was impressed with Mr. Gaston. So I reported the nominations. I told the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] that we had received no protests against the nominations. I did go home for a few days.

I did not have any right to promise anything, but when I came back my attention was called to the fact that there was a great deal of business waiting in the Export-Import Bank which could not be attended to. My attention was called to the fact that the members had not been paid, but I do not think the question of pay makes much difference. I told Secretary Snyder that the nominations had been reported, and that there was no objection before the committee when we had them before us. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] said he would object, and he stated so on the Senate floor.

Mr. President, that is the status in which I find myself, I have been trying only to aid the business of the bank. It is up to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], the majority leader, as to what he wants done. I have carried out my part. I would have held the hearings, but no one wanted to protest.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, 2 minutes will be sufficient for me to state my position. I thought I made it clear in the first place. It is merely the mechanics of this matter in which I am interested. I know that on more than one occasion I asked that the nominations go over, because I had been informed that the junior Senator from Oregon wanted them to go over until his resolution was acted on.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. As chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency I may say that if an investigation of the Export-Import Bank is desired, since everything else is being investigated, I am willing that the investigation be held. I think, however, that the holding up of consideration of these nominations is a serious matter for the reason that the bank cannot, while the nominations are held up, transact business.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, if the distinguished Senator from Oregon would like to have the nominations sent back to the committee, and he can work out an arrangement in that respect with the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, that is perfectly agreeable to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senator from Nebraska knows that I cannot very well ask that the four nominations be recommitted to the committee.

Mr. WHERRY. I am simply commenting on some observations which were made. I am not at all averse if the Senate wants to take any further action with respect to these men. I simply went to the distinguished Senator from Oregon and told him I could no longer ask unanimous consent that the nominations be passed over; that I felt the issue ought to be reached, and that if no other Senator would make the motion, I would do so myself.

I know Mr. Arey. He is a very fine gentleman. If it is believed that an investigation will reveal anything pertinent I would be the first Senator to agree to such an investigation. If there is anything wrong about any of his activities it is all right with me to have an investigation, if Senators want it. But the nominations of these four gentlemen are on the Executive Calendar. The nominations should either be returned to the committee or there ought to be some action taken on them on the floor of the Senate.

The nominations have been before us since June 27. The time has come when we should either confirm them or reject them. I only hope the junior Senator from Oregon and the majority leader can agree on a date on which the question can be raised and the matter can be ironed out on the floor of the Senate. I hope action can be taken at an early date. By that I do not mean today or tomorrow, but I hope the two Senators can get together and arrange for a date soon when some action can be taken by the Senate with respect to the nominations.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I am interested in the nomination of Mr. Lynn U. Stambaugh, because he comes from North Dakota. I wish to say to my distinguished friend from Oregon that Mr. Stambaugh would, in my opinion, want an investigation with respect to any kind or character of charge that might be made against him. I think he would ask for an investigation if a charge were made against him. If there were the slightest doubt raised as to his capacity, his honesty or his integrity I do not think he would want to be confirmed. I have known Mr. Stambaugh for 30 years. I endorsed him. I endorse him now. I do not believe any evidence of any derogatory kind or character can be produced against Mr. Stambaugh. I will say in Mr. Stambaugh's behalf that I am sure he would want an investigation if any charges against him were presented. He is just that sort of a man.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, in view of the fact that one of the nominees comes from Nebraska I wish to join with my colleague in the remarks he has made with respect to Hawthorne Arey. He has an excellent reputation in the State of Nebraska. I think he has a splendid record as a member of the Board of the Export-Import Bank. I hope that those who want to have something in the RECORD in connection with the confirmation of these gentlemen can make an arrangement so that it can be handled at an early date without any undue delay.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that biographical sketches of the four nominees may be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The biographical sketches are as follows:

NOMINATIONS OF DIRECTORS OF EXPORT-IMPORT BANK

Nominations of the four Directors of the Export-Import Bank were reported by Chairman MAYBANK, of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, on June 27, with the statement that a quorum of the committee was not present at its meeting on that date, but that the members had been polled and a majority approved the nominations. The chairman further stated that both Senators from the respective States of the nominees approved the nominations (p. 9236, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 27, 1950).

Biographical sketches of the nominees are attached.

(Submitted June 16)

NOMINATIONS OF MEMBERS OF THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF THE EXPORT-IMPORT BANK

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, as in executive session, I report favorably the nominations of four members of the Board of Directors of the Export-Import Bank. I may say, Mr. President, that we did not have a quorum present at the committee meeting this morning, but I have had the clerk of the committee poll the members of the committee and find that a majority of them have approved of the nominations of the four members of the Board of Directors.

I conferred with the Senators from the States from which each of the nominees comes. Mr. Arey's nomination was approved by the Senators from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER and Mr. WHERRY], Mr. Gaston's nomination was approved by the Senators from New York [Mr. IVES and Mr. LEHMAN], the nomination of Mr. Gauss was approved by the Senators from Connecticut [Mr. MCMAHON and Mr. BENTON], and the nomination of Mr. Stambaugh was approved by the Senators from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER and Mr. YOUNG].

The reason I am reporting the nominations today is that the terms of these gentlemen expire on the 30th day of June. If these nominations are not approved before that date, the bank will have no Directors. Furthermore, under the rules of the Senate the names of nominees must lie over until the following day. I merely wished to make that explanation at this time. I regret that the committee could not have a quorum present this morning. Some members had to attend a meeting of the Committee on Appropriations. As I said, the Senators representing the States from which these men come have approved the nominations, and I trust that when the nominations are reached on the calendar the Senate will confirm them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nominations will be received and placed on the Executive Calendar.

The nominations ordered to be placed on the Executive Calendar are as follows: Hawthorne Arey, of Nebraska; Herbert E. Gaston, of New York; Clarence E. Gauss, of Connecticut; and Lynn U. Stambaugh, of North Dakota, to be members of the Board of Directors of the Export-Import Bank of Washington for terms of 5 years each, expiring June 30, 1955.

CLARENCE E. GAUSS

Clarence E. Gauss, a member of the Board of Directors of the Export-Import Bank of Washington, was born January 12, 1887, in Washington, D. C. He was educated in public and private schools of Washington and by private tutors. On August 2, 1906, he entered the Department of State and served in that Department and in the Foreign Service of the United States until May 31, 1945. Mr. Gauss was appointed by President Truman as a Republican member of the Board of Directors of the Export-Import Bank on December 20, 1945.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, on tomorrow afternoon at 5 o'clock, after we have debated the appropriation bill, I am going to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, and at that time we are going to discuss these nominations to the Export-Import Bank with a view to having them confirmed or rejected. We shall try to stay in session long enough to give every Senator who is interested an opportunity to discuss the nominations.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I think the majority leader and I should exchange views as to the procedure tomorrow afternoon, so that he will have advance notice of what I propose to do at that time. I shall move at that time that the nominations be recommitted to the committee for an investigation of the policies the nominees have initiated and carried out as members of the board of directors of the Export-Import Bank. I may say to Members of the Senate who are very much interested in the investigation of the State Department, that there is a very direct relationship between the policies of the Export-Import Bank and certain policies of the State Department, which I do not think are in the public interest.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point in my remarks a letter I sent to the Chairman of the Export-Import Bank on June 8, a copy of his reply of June 14, another letter from him to me under date of June 28, and a copy of my reply on the same date, June 28.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, may I see those letters?

Mr. MORSE. I am very glad to hand them to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I have examined the letters and I have no objection.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JUNE 8, 1950.

Hon. HERBERT E. GASTON,
Office of the Chairman,
Export-Import Bank of Washington,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN GASTON: There is a great deal of interest among some of us in the Senate in regard to the recently announced loan to Argentina.

As far as I am concerned, before I pass final judgment on the policy involved in the loan, I wish to find out certain facts. Therefore, I shall appreciate it very much if you will have prepared and submitted to me a memorandum on that loan answering the following questions:

3. What were the terms and conditions of
2. For what purposes was the loan made?
3. What were the terms and conditions of the loan?
4. Who were the direct beneficiaries of the loan?
5. Who were the lawyers or representatives who represented the beneficiaries in any of the negotiations connected with the loan?

I shall appreciate the earliest possible reply to this request because I am very much interested in certain questions of public policy as they affect our country's international program, particularly in respect to the future of our four-point program.

Sincerely yours,

WAYNE MORSE,
United States Senator.

JUNE 14, 1950.

The Honorable WAYNE MORSE,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR MORSE: My delay in answering your letter of June 8 was due to my absence from Washington for several days.

Following a settlement by Argentina of several controversial commercial policy matters involving United States firms, Argentina approached the Export-Import Bank with a request for financial aid. The Argentine request, at least informally, was for credit of upward of $300,000,000, which would be available for purchase of new machinery, equipment, and supplies for importation into Argentina. After extended and thorough analyses of the economic and financial situation of Argentina, the Board of Directors of the bank authorized a commitment to the following effect:

1. A credit of $125,000,000 would be established in favor of a consortium of Argentine commercial banks having adequate resources in the opinion of the Export-Import Bank. The credit would be unconditionally guaranteed by the Central Bank of Argentina.

2. The credit would be available solely to aid Argentina to liquidate its past-due dollar obligations on private and governmental account.

3. The principal of the credit would be repayable in 20 semiannual installments beginning in June 1954, and would bear interest at the rate of 3½ percent per annum payable semiannually. The two principal conditions of the credit would be: (1) In the event the credit should be insufficient to pay in full all past-due dollar obligations on private and governmental account, the Argentine banks would furnish sufficient dollars to liquidate the obligations in excess of the amount of the credit, and (2) the Government of Argentina would agree with the bank to use its best efforts to work out within its financial possibilities a settlement of arrearages on financial account mutually satisfactory to Argentina and the creditors.

4. The direct beneficiaries of the loan would be those United States firms which have shipped goods to Argentina and have not been paid therefor and those commercial banks, principally United States banks, which have discounted commercial dollar drafts for their customers and have not been reimbursed therefor by the drawee banks in Argentina. We do not have at this time a list of the names of the firms and banks nor the respective amounts due such creditors. This information, of course, would be furnished us prior to the time we were to make disbursement of the credit. Indeed, we have in mind disbursement directly by this bank in dollars in New York to the various creditors upon application and certification to us by Argentina of the names and amounts due the various creditors.

5. The negotiations were carried on with this bank by Ramon A. Cereijo, Minister of Treasury of Argentina, and several technical advisers of the Government and the Central Bank of Argentina who accompanied Mr. Cereijo to this country. No United States nationals were involved in conducting the negotiations on behalf of Argentina.

The decision of the Board of Directors of the bank to extend a credit on the terms and conditions indicated above was conveyed by letter dated May 19, 1950, which I addressed to Mr. Cereijo. In that letter I stated to Mr. Cereijo that the Bank was prepared to receive a duly authorized representative or representatives of the commercial banks and of the Central Bank of Argentina to work out the provisions of the necessary agreement for the establishment of the credit, the form of the promissory notes which will be given to evidence the credit, and other details of the operation of the credit. We have not as yet been advised by Argentina as to when representatives of the Argentine banks will come to the United States to work out the details for the establishment of the credit.

Sincerely yours,

HERBERT E. GASTON,
Chairman.

JUNE 28, 1940.

Hon. HERBERT E. GASTON,
Chairman, Export-Import Bank of Washington, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GASTON: Thank you very much for your letter of June 28. I think my letter of June 8 was perfectly clear and that your relpy to it was unsatisfactory. I shall be glad to discuss the matter further with you before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee when the hearing I have requested is held.

Very truly yours,

WAYNE MORSE,
United States Senator.

EXPORT-IMPORT BANK OF WASHINGTON,
Washington, D. C., June 28, 1950.

The Honorable WAYNE MORSE,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: You addressed to me, on June 8, certain inquiries with respect to the recently announced loan to Argentina. On June 14, I replied answering your questions as I understood them.

I now learn, by reading the report in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday of a speech by you on the Senate floor, that the question to which you desired answer from me is quite different from any you addressed to me in your letter of June 8. In your letter of June 8 you asked "Who were the lawyers or representatives who represented the beneficiaries in any of the negotiations connected with the loan?" My answer was "The negotiations were carried on with this bank by Ramon A. Cereijo, Minister of Treasury of Argentina, and several technical advisers of the Government and the Central Bank of Argentina who accompanied Mr. Cereijo to this country. No United States nationals were involved in conducting the negotiations on behalf of Argentina."

This I believe to be an explicit answer to your question listed as No. 5 in your letter of June 8.

The question which you propounded on the floor of the Senate yesterday as was follows: "If Mr. Gaston did not understand my meaning when he read my letter, let me tell him from this desk today what I meant when I asked him some of the questions contained in my letter to him. I want to learn from him, as Chairman of the Export-Import Bank, the extent to which some of the powerful United States corporations with certain economic interests in Latin America bring strong representations to bear upon the Export-Import Bank in connection with the determination of the loaning policy of that bank."

After rereading your letter of June 8 I think you will agree with me that no such question was either asked or intimated in your letter. The answer to it is, however, quite simple. I know of no representations by powerful United States corporations with economic interests in Latin America which have been brought to bear upon the Export-Import Bank in connection with the determination of the lending policy of this Bank. Certainly no such representations were brought to bear upon this bank in connection with the Argentine credit.

Our discussions were solely with representatives of the Argentine Government and I know of no attempt by any corporation or individual having interests in Latin America to exercise any influence whatever upon this Bank in connection with the credit.

I would not want this answer to be broadened to include attempts to influence legislation before the Congress since I know that representatives of some corporations having important interests in Latin America have been very actively in opposition to the proposal now pending before the Senate to empower the Export-Import Bank to guarantee productive investments in foreign countries against the risks of inconvertibility and expropriation without prompt compensation. Nor would I want to imply that United States manufacturing corporations desiring to sell their products in Latin-American countries have not been active in attempting to obtain loans for financing goods purchased from them. They have; but this is, of course, a mere matter of salesmanship. One of the major activities of the bank has been the making of exporter credits benefiting American manufacturers and exporters.

The Argentine credit, like other foreign credits, was of course discussed with various representatives of the State Department as well as with other agencies of this Government. The Secretary of State is a member of the Board of Directors of the Export-Import Bank and the bank is required by law to submit all its proposals for lending to the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems for advice and coordination. This organization consists of the Secretary of the Treasury, as Chairman, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, the Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, the Administrator of the Economic Cooperation Administration, and the Chairman of the Export-Import Bank.

I regret that you did not ask me the question or questions you had in mind in your letter of June 8 so that I could have replied to them. If there are other questions with respect to the policies or activities of the bank to which you would like to have answers I should be glad to have you write to me freely or to talk to you about them at any time.

Yours very truly,

HERBERT E. GASTON,
Chairman.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JULY 17, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. S. M. Yancey, Methodist minister, Fayetteville, Ark., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, father of us all, we stand today with bowed heads and heavy hearts, facing an upset world situation that can be settled only with Thy help and guidance. Thou hast been good to this country and its people; may we show our worthiness by helping others to see and know the Christ who has done so much for us.

We pray today for our President and our Congress, whose duty it is to govern this land. Give them, Father, the strength, wisdom, and moral courage that these trying times demand. Grant them the faith to safely lead this Nation and the world to an enduring peace, for the benefit of man and the glory of God.

These things we humbly ask in the name of Almighty God. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, July 13, 1950, was read and approved.

SENDING OF TROOPS TO KOREA BY MEMBERS OF THE UNITED NATIONS

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

Why are we fighting in Korea? To test the United Nations, in my judgment, as to whether they are a unit in determining world brotherhood. If they are, then they should all join forces to defend brotherhood. Are they sincere? If so, at once send troops to Korea to defend the United Nations in proportion to their manpower. This means Great Britain, France, Canada, Belgium, Holland, Australia, Norway, and all the other United Nations member countries.

I request the President of the United States give Congress a weekly accounting of the help we get from the United Nations, singly and jointly. If they do not send men immediately, I ask, Why should we send over to the Orient our men to be murdered for their protection? This is serious. It means all-out war. It means drafting; it means rationing; it means men, money and munitions. It means much for other countries, and ruination to us if we go it alone. David Lawrence says, "What we see today is a need for world-wide conscription."

Mr. President, this is not a one-man war. Why not take Congress into your confidence, before you do the wrong thing and before it is too late to save ourselves from our leaders in government? Mr. President, you say we are not at war. Well, it does not look that way to me.

The following little poem by Edgar Guest, We Haven't Learned, seems to me particularly appropriate at this time:

JUST FOLKS

(By Edgar A. Guest)

WE HAVEN'T LEARNED

With all the wisdom taught in schools
There shouldn't be so many fools,
So many, stupid, blundering men
Who want to go to war again.
By now 'tis strange we haven't learned
That peace from war is never earned;
That never long are cannons still
Since war breeds war and always will.
We must be fools to think that we Must battle when we disagree
And give to fearful weapons new
The problems sense would better do.
Oh, sorry men so much to know
And yet to learn one truth so slow:
That reason, if we dared to try,
Would save the boys war calls to die!

GUNS OR BUTTER?

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, the Agriculture Department has 1 pound of butter in cold storage for every person in the United States. I wonder how many tanks that butter would buy? We have $90,000,000 worth of butter and no 60-ton tanks in or out of cold storage.

Maybe we had better stop living so high up on the hog while our good soldiers are dying down in the Korean mud.

It is time for business to forego big profits, labor to pledge a wage freeze in return, the farmer to accept sacrifices in his support program, and the taxpayer to support a pay-as-you-go war to avoid further inflation.

This is no mere police action. It is everybody's war. It is time to stop this milling around.

This great country can, through voluntary cooperation, strengthen our economy. It depends upon the vision and capacity of our national leaders.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

EKLUTNA PROJECT, ALASKA

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 940) to authorize construction of the Eklutna project, hydroelectric generating plant, and transmission facilities in connection therewith, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert "That in order to encourage and promote the economic development of the Territory of Alaska, to foster the establishment of essential industries in said Territory, and to further the self-sufficiency of national defense installations located therein, the Secretary of the Interior (hereinafter referred to as the 'Secretary') is authorized to construct, operate, and maintain the Eklutna project in the vicinity of Anchorage, Alaska, consisting of a low dam at Lake Eklutna, a diversion tunnel and penstock a power plant with an installed capacity of 30,000 kilowatts, transmission lines to Anchorage and other load centers, and related works (except recreational facilities) substantially in accordance with the plans and recommendations in the report adopted by the Secretary of the Interior on January 18, 1949, on file with the Committee on Public Lands of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the Senate at an estimated cost of $20,365,400. The capital investment properly allocable to each unit of said project, as determined by the Federal Power Commission, shall be amortized over a reasonable period of years, and interest shall be charged on the unamortized balance of the full capital investment in said project at a rate of 2½ percent per annum and shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of miscellaneous receipts. All minerals discovered in the course of constructing the Eklutna project are hereby reserved to the United States and may be sold or otherwise disposed of in such manner as may be prescribed by the Secretary, if he finds and so reports to the Congress in writing that the only economically practicable method of recovering the ore so reserved is to provide for the salvage of any minerals that may be contained in the excavated materials removed from the tunnel during the normal process of construction. The net proceeds from any such sale or other disposition shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of miscellaneous receipts. The waters of Eklutna Lake and its tributaries which are required for the operation of the Eklutna project are hereby reserved for that purpose.

"SEC. 2. Electric power and energy generated at the Eklutna project, except that portion required in the operation of such project, shall be disposed of in such a manner as to encourage the most widespread use thereof at the lowest possible rates to consumers consistent with sound business principles and the maintenance of adequate electric service, the rate schedules to become effective upon confirmation and approval by the Federal Power Commission. Such rate schedules shall be drawn having regard to the recovery (upon the basis of the application of such rate schedules to the capacity of the electric facilities of the project) of the cost of producing and transmitting the power and energy, including the amortization of the capital investment as provided in section 1 hereof. Preference in the sale of such power and energy shall be given to all public bodies and cooperatives on the same terms, and to Federal agencies. It shall be a condition of every contract made under this act for the sale of power and energy that the purchaser, if it be a purchaser for resale, will deliver power and energy to Federal agencies or facilities thereof within its transmission area at a reasonable charge for the use of its transmission facilities. All receipts from the transmission and sale of electric power and energy generated at said project shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of miscellaneous receipts, save and except that the Treasury shall set up and maintain from the receipts for said project a continuing fund of $200,000 to the credit of the Secretary and subject to expenditure by him, to defray emergency expenses and to insure continuous operation.

"SEC. 3. The Secretary is authorized to perform any and all acts and enter into such agreements as may be appropriate for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect, including the acquisition of rights and property, and the Secretary, when an appropriation shall have been made for the commencement of construction or for operation and maintenance of said project, may, in connection with the construction or operation and maintenance of such project, enter into contracts for miscellaneous services for materials and supplies, as well as for construction, which may cover such periods of time as the Secretary may consider necessary but in which the liability of the United States shall be contingent upon appropriations being made therefor.

"SEC. 4. Upon completion of amortization of the capital investment allocated to power, the Secretary is authorized and directed to report to the Congress upon the feasibility and desirability of transferring the Eklutna project to public ownership and control in Alaska.

"SEC. 5. Wherever in this act authority is vested in, or functions are to be performed by, the Secretary, such authority may be exercised, and functions performed, through such agencies of the Department of the Interior as he may designate.

"SEC. 6. There are authorized to be appropriated the sum of $20,365,400 for the construction of the Eklutna project, and, in addition, such sums as may be necessary for the operation and maintenance of such project."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ALLOCATION OF STEEL BY VOLUNTARY AGREEMENT

Mr. MACY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD an explanation of a bill that I am introducing relating to the allocation of steel by voluntary agreement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MACY. As you all know, a thriving gray market in steel is with us again. In many areas, sheet steel is bringing two to three times the regular mill price. Steel scrap prices have skyrocketed and the so-called conversion deals which help inflate our economy are on the increase. It now appears that the present Korean situation will serve to worsen this condition.

I fear that all these factors will shortly be used as arguments for the imposition of governmental controls and regulations on business. This is something which I feel can and should be avoided, except when absolutely necessary in case a national emergency is such as to compel.

As you recall, there was a severe steel shortage following World War II and in some quarters consideration was given to the reimposition of wartime controls. As chairman of the Committee to Investigate Questionable Trade Practices, I found that a serious condition did exist, but I also reached the conclusion that this problem could be better handled by industry itself, with governmental cooperation rather than arbitrary regulation. This confidence does not appear to have been misplaced, for the record of the Office of Industry Cooperation under the guidance of Secretary Sawyer is a fine example of the way in which industry can solve its own problem of supply and distribution. I am, therefore, preparing a bill which will authorize the President or the Secretary of Commerce to again call upon industry for the formation of such a group so that voluntary allocation may obviate the necessity for mandatory controls.

BRITISH OIL SALES TO CHINA

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, under the heading "British oil sales to China boom," the New York Times of July 14 reports that the British Asiatic Petroleum Co., a member of the giant Shell family, is moving into the gap left in the supply of oil to Communist China.

What caused the gap? It was the wholly commendable action of the Sacony and Caltex companies, of United States origin, which have stopped supplying the petroleum market on the China mainland. The report says that the two companies which with the British Asiatic formed the "Big three" of the Far East oil business, shut down on supply to China at the request of the State Department.

Mr. Speaker, no amount of explaining can make the conduct of the British Asiatic add up to anything except a deliberate obstruction to our Korean campaign. The air is filled with speculation that Chinese Communists will soon be fighting as part of the North Korean Army and there have been reports that they already are. Now that the two American companies have stopped supplying the China mainland, the only visible source of supply, in any important quantity, is the British Asiatic.

The Shell interests have long enjoyed our hospitality. They were admitted on equal terms with our own citizens to do business in the United States. The assets of the Shell companies in this country amount to hundreds of millions of dollars. I know many of their employees—fine, upstanding men whose anger at the action of the British Asiatic must be equal to my own.

Mr. Speaker, Government action here cannot reach the British Asiatic company but a protest should be made. Probably of greater importance is the fact that we have ways of making our individual protests.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. GORE asked and was given permission to address the House for 20 minutes today, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. This is Consent Calendar day. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Consent Calendar.

AMENDING NATIONAL SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE ACT TO PROVIDE ADDITIONAL DISABILITY BENEFITS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 6560) to amend the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended, to authorize provisions in national service life insurance policies for increased monthly disability benefits.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill go over without prejudice.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I must object to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Three objections are necessary.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

There being no further objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of section 602 (v) (1) of the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended, as precedes the first proviso is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(v) (1) The Administrator is hereby authorized and directed, upon application by the insured and proof of good health satisfactory to the Administrator and payment of such extra premium as the Administrator shall prescribe, to include in any national service life insurance policy on the life of the insured provisions whereby an insured who is shown to have become totally disabled for a period of six consecutive months or more commencing after the date of such application and before attaining the age of 60 and while the payment of any premium is not in default, shall be paid monthly disability benefits from the first day of the seventh consecutive month of and during the continuance of such total disability of not less than $5 nor more than $10 (in multiples of $1) for each $1,000 of such insurance in effect when such benefits become payable:".

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and include a letter from the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1950.

Hon. JOHN E. RANKIN,
Chairman, Committee on Veterans' Affairs,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. RANKIN: This is in reply to your letter dated January 7, 1950, requesting a report on H. R. 6560, Eighty-first Congress, a bill to amend the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended, to authorize provisions in national service life-insurance policies for increased monthly disability benefits.

The purpose of the bill is to amend section 602 (v) (1) of the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended, to increase the amount of total disability income benefits which may be underwritten from $5 to $10 per month (in multiples of $1) for each $1,000 of insurance.

Up to about 18 years ago commercial companies underwrote disability income benefits which generally provided for a monthly income of $10 for each $1,000 of the face amount of life insurance in force, limiting the coverage to age 55, 60, or 65. The experience under this type of coverage turned out to be quite unfavorable, and the companies either stopped underwriting such coverage entirely or restricted the coverage in various ways so as to eliminate as much as possible the elements responsible for this unfavorable experience. At the present time there are 37 companies which are writing disability income insurance in this country. Of the 37, there are 20 which limit the monthly income to $5 per $1,000, and 4 which issue policies providing for $10 per $1,000. The other 13 companies provide for modifications such as the choice in amount of monthly income as $5 or $10, or with benefits commencing at $10 upon disablement and reducing to $5 after a specified period or specified age, or with total termination of payments at maturity or at some specified age. Thus, the companies as a whole have taken a conservative rather than a liberal attitude with respect to the issuing of this type of coverage.

Unlike private insurance companies, there are no restrictions in the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended, authorizing the Veterans' Administration to make a selection of applicants for the total disability income provision because of occupational hazards, moral or other elements which might unduly affect the disability experience. Also, a uniform premium is charged for the disability provision without any increase in premiums being made in individual cases. It is appreciated that some individuals would very much desire to carry a disability provision paying them $10 for each $1,000 of insurance as a benefit payment in the event of total disability. This is especially true of veterans engaged in a hazardous occupation. To double the amount of income available from this provision would increase its attractiveness to persons whose duties or occupations are of a hazardous nature. Such an increase in these cases may result in adverse selection against the national service life insurance fund.

The present disability income rate of $5 per $1,000 of insurance is in line with the limitation placed on disability income provision by private insurance companies and with the total disability provision available on United States Government life insurance. It should be remembered that the increased disability income provision, if authorized, will continue over a long period of time. In times of unemployment or depression, experience has shown that such provisions for income become particularly attractive and that some individuals are inclined to continue as long as possible a disability status providing benefits. The present limitations on the amount of income to be paid in the event of total disability appear to be reasonable.

Under the provisions of the bill, individuals suffering identical disabilities would receive varying amounts of income with the least favored economically receiving a smaller share due to their inability to carry the maximum amount of insurance and the maximum amount of total disability income protection. Thus, the bill would benefit most those individuals who are able to purchase the maximum amount of insurance and coverage under the total disability income provision.

Under the provisions of the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended, the Government pays all administrative costs and assumes the liability for payment of the total disability income benefit for all disabilities resulting from the extra hazard of military or naval service. The provisions of the bill would increase the liability to be borne by the appropriation of public funds. It is important to consider the probability that the proposed benefit may prove so attractive, especially in periods of economic stress, as to greatly increase the cost of such benefits to the national service life insurance fund which would adversely affect the interests of other policyholders. As indicated above, the experience of private insurers, who underwrote disability income provision of $10 per month for each $1,000 of insurance, forced them to reduce the benefit provision so as to lessen any economic inducement to continued idleness. The likelihood of similar unfavorable experience under our system seems unavoidable because of the rather generous payments already provided under the pension and compensation laws administered by the Veterans' Administration.

From the Government's standpoint, the bill would also involve a cost because claims determined to be due to the extra hazard of military or naval service would be borne by the national service life insurance appropriation. Should the United States become involved in a future war, the cost of the increased total disability provision may be tremendous. The provisions of the bill might tend to increase administrative costs, but such increase cannot be estimated.

Because of the adverse effect which the provisions of the bill might have upon the national service life insurance fund, it is my belief that enactment of the bill would not serve the best interests of the policyholders for whom such fund is maintained.

Advice has been received from the Bureau of the Budget that there would be no objection to the presentation of this report to your committee.

Sincerely yours,

CARL R. GRAY, Jr.,
Administrator.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PREMIUMS ON NATIONAL SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 8236) to provide that on and after January 1, 1951, dividends on national service life insurance shall be applied in payment of premiums unless the insured has requested payment of dividends in cash.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 602 (f) of the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended, is hereby amended by substituting a colon for the period at the end thereof and adding the following: "Provided further, That until and unless the Veterans' Administration has received from the insured a request in writing for payment in cash, any dividend accumulations and unpaid dividends shall be applied in payment of premiums becoming due on insurance subsequent to the date the dividend is payable after January 1, 1951."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDMENTS TO NATIONAL SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE ACT

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 8235) to amend further the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

PREPARATORY COMMISSION FOR INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 5863) for refund of customs duties to the Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding this bill is scheduled to be called up under suspension of the rules today. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

GRANTING OF LAND TO CITY OF ALBUQUERQUE

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 8678) granting land to the city of Albuquerque for public purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have been informed by people in New Mexico, following the discussion we had at last week's session, that this land is not to be used for college dormitory buildings, and the chances are it will be sold at a profit by some speculators who may reap the benefits and for that reason, Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. I do not think the gentleman is fully informed about the matter. This land was purchased by the State of New Mexico in 1906. There were originally 640 acres purchased. Half of it has been lying idle and not used for any purpose whatever. The State paid for it, and has had its money invested in it for all these years. After 44 years they have decided that it ought to be sold and the money used, not for dormitories but to build an auditorium. I do not think the gentleman should object to the bill.

Mr. RICH. Here is what this letter says:

You are doing well to look into this deal. No auditorium is contemplated for the remaining 320 acres. In fact, the city has a dog pound there. The area is good speculative land.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Yes. It can be sold for the people to use; instead of a dog pound it should be put to beneficial use.

Mr. RICH. He says further:

But the area is good speculative land. Someone will get it for a "song" and make a good profit. By continuing to object you might not be saving the people anything but you will prevent a local deal which will probably "smell." Check on it closely.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. The city of Albuquerque is not going to sell it for a "song." It will sell it for the best price it can get so that the funds may be used for an auditorium. I do not think the gentleman should object to it. The land is owned by the city and it cannot be used by the Federal Government. To object to it is to take a dog-in-the-manger attitude. The Federal Government cannot use it, and we ought not to keep the city from selling it and having it developed.

Mr. RICH. If this property was sold by the Government to the city for $1.50 an acre and now you are going to dispose of it and make a large profit out of it, why do you not give that money back to the United States Treasury, the people of the United States, and let everybody benefit accordingly? And then the city can do what they please with the land. That is what I want you to do with it.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Would the gentleman say that we should figure the interest on the money that we have invested on that land ever since 1906?

Mr. RICH. It never cost you much of anything. You only paid a dollar and a half an acre for it. I am willing that you get interest on your money. However, you had the use of this land for these years.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. That is all it was worth at that time. It was more than it was worth. Does the gentleman mean if he buys a piece of property and, after 40 years if he can sell it for more, he should turn the difference back to the seller? His attitude is picayunish.

Mr. RICH. If you got something for nothing, to be used for public use, and you are not going to use it, then it is your duty to turn it back to the Treasury of the United States, the place you received it and where it belongs, if you have no use for it.

Mr. Speaker, I object.

PURCHASE OF BONDS TO COVER OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES OF THE GOVERNMENT

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 8706) to provide for the purchase of bonds to cover officers and employees of the Government.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, this bill is also on the calendar to be called up under suspension of the rules. I therefore ask unanimous consent that it be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

DEPARTMENT OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY IN THE VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 8619) to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a Department of Medicine and Surgery in the Veterans' Administration," approved January 3, 1946, to provide for the appointment of dental specialists, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 8, 10 (a), and 12 of the act entitled "An act to establish a Department of Medicine and Surgery in the Veterans' Administration," approved January 3, 1946, are amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 8. (a) Within the restrictions herein imposed, the Chief Medical Director may rate any doctor appointed under subsection (a) of section 4 of this act as a medical or surgical specialist, and, upon the recommendation of the Assistant Chief Medical Director for the Dental Services, may rate any doctor of dental surgery or dental medicine, appointed under subsection (a) of section 4 of this act, as a dental specialist: Provided, That no person shall at any one time hold more than one such rating.

"(b) No person may be rated as a medical, surgical, or dental specialist unless he is certified as a specialist by an American specialty board, recognized by the Administrator where such boards exist; or if no such boards exist, he has been examined and found qualified by a board appointed by the Chief Medical Director from specialists of the Department of Medicine and Surgery holding ratings in the specialty to which the candidate aspires: Provided, That whenever there are insufficient specialists, rated in the proper specialty, who are readily available to constitute such a board, the Chief Medical Director may substitute consultants with comparable qualifications employed under section 14 of this act.

"(c) Any person, rated as a medical, surgical, or dental specialist under the provisions of this section shall retain such rating until it shall be withdrawn by the Chief Medical Director: Provided, That the Chief Medical Director shall not withdraw any such rating until it shall have been determined by a board of specialists that the person holding such rating is no longer qualified in his specialty.

and fair hearing, charges of inaptitude, inefficiency, or misconduct of any person employed in a position provided in subsection (a) of section 4 of this act: Provided, That when such charges concern a dentist, the majority of employees on the disciplinary board shall be dentists."

SEC. 3. Section 12 of said act is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 12. The Administrator shall establish a special medical advisory group composed of members of the medical, dental, and allied scientific professions, nominated by the Chief Medical Director, whose duties shall be to advise the Administrator, through the Chief Medical Director, and the Chief Medical Director direct, relative to the care and treatment of disabled veterans, and other matters pertinent to the Department of Medicine and Surgery. The special advisory group shall conduct regular calendar quarterly meetings. The number, terms of service, compensation, and allowances to members of such advisory group shall be in accord with existing law and regulations."

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT PROVIDING FOR METHOD OF ELECTING PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 2) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That an amendment is hereby proposed to the Constitution of the United States which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by three-fourths of the legislatures of the several States. Said amendment shall be as follows:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of 4 years, and together with the Vice President, chosen for the same term, be elected as provided in this Constitution.

"The electoral college system of electing the President and Vice President of the United States is hereby abolished. The President and Vice President shall be elected by the people of the several States. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature. Congress shall determine the time of such election, which shall be the same throughout the United States. Until otherwise determined by the Congress, such election shall be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November of the year preceding the year in which the regular term of the President is to begin. Each State shall be entitled to a number of electoral votes equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which such State may be entitled in the Congress.

"Within 45 days after such election, or at such time as the Congress shall direct, the official custodian of the election returns of each State shall make distinct lists of all persons for whom votes were cast for President and the number of votes for each, and the total vote of the electors of the State for all persons for President, which lists he shall sign and certify and transmit sealed to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. On the 6th day of January following the election, unless the Congress by law appoints a different day not earlier than the 4th day of January and not later than the 10th day of January, the President of the Senate shall in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatitves open all certificates and the votes shall then be counted. Each person for whom votes were cast for President in each State shall be credited with such proportion of the electoral votes thereof as he received of the total vote of the electors therein for President. In making the computations fractional numbers less than one one-thousandth shall be disregarded. The person having the greatest number of electoral votes for President shall be President if such number be at least 40 percent of the whole number of such electoral votes. If no person have at least 40 percent of the whole number of electoral votes, then from the persons having the two highest numbers of electoral votes for President the Senate and the House of Representatives sitting in joint session shall choose immediately by ballot the President. A majority of the votes of the combined authorized membership of the Senate and the House of Representatives shall be necessary for a choice.

"The Vice President shall be likewise elected at the same time and in the same manner and subject to the same provisions as the President, but no person constitutionally ineligible for the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice President of the United States.

"The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate and the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate and the House of Representatives may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them.

"SEC. 2. Paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of section 1, article II, of the Constitution, the twelfth article of amendment to the Constitution, and section 4 of the twentieth article of amendment to the Constitution, are hereby repealed.

"SEC. 3. This article shall take effect on the 10th day of February following its ratification.

"SEC. 4. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States within 7 years from the date of its submission to the States by the Congress."

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may use, not to exceed 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, we have under consideration Senate Joint Resolution No. 2. I regret exceedingly that the limited time will permit only a general outline of the resolution and a somewhat dogmatic statement of the propositions in support thereof, without adequate time for documentation or elucidation.

Senate Joint Resolution 2 passed the Senate on February 1 by a vote of 64 to 23. Briefly, it does this. It abolishes the electoral college; it abolishes electors; it provides for direct voting for President and Vice President. It retains the electoral vote in each State, but provides that the electoral vote of each State shall be divided in exact ratio with the popular vote.

In Senate Joint Resolution 2 is the Lucas amendment. Under the Lucas amendment, unless one of the candidates gets as much as 40 percent of the total electoral vote, the election is thrown into the Congress, where the Senate and the House, sitting jointly, select a President from the two high candidates. I wish I had time to explain the many advantages of this method of congressional action over the old method.

Some evils of the present system are—

First. Existing provisions as to the choosing of electors, the manner in which their votes are cast and counted, and the deciding of elections in the Congress is an open invitation to fraud and chicanery and unless changed will some day result in disaster.

Second. The electoral college confines and largely restricts national campaigns to a half dozen pivotal States. The national campaign committees and the political strategists of both parties sit down with a map of the Nation and decide where to do their work and where to spend their money.

Third. The electoral college greatly restricts the field of presidential possibilities.

Fourth. The electoral college permits and invites irresponsible control and domination by small organized minority groups within the large pivotal States. It aggravates and accentuates the building up and solidification within these States of religious, economic, and racial blocs.

Fifth. The electoral college deprives great masses of our citizens of the educational benefits of national campaigns and lessens their concern in national affairs.

Sixth. The electoral college places unconscionable burdens and temptations upon a President elected by it.

Some benefits of the proposed reform are—

First. We will have absolutely democratic elections; everybody's vote counts for the person for whom cast.

Second. There will be little opportunity for fraud or pressure-group action.

Third. There will be no tie votes; the high man wins.

Fourth. Sectionalism will be largely abated.

The Government of the United States is by all odds the biggest and most important business in the world. When a young Nation, we could muddle through more easily and make mistakes with less injury than we can today. We have now come of age. Our domestic and foreign responsibilities are staggering. Unless we make democracy work at home, we have little chance of teaching it abroad. There is an old facetious and vulgar saying that, "God looks after sailors, drunks, and the United States of America." God has been good to us, indeed, but He may not always smile upon us. In the matter of reform, we are often like the Irishman who refused to repair his roof when the sun was shining. There is at least one major repair job that should be made before our structure of government is seriously impaired—before some storm blows our house down. This job is to abolish electors and the electoral college and to substitute an honest and democratic method of electing Presidents.

This subject is by no means new. In fact, it is as old as the Government itself. Many resolutions to this effect have been introduced in the Congress from time to time. In the Seventy-second and Seventy-third Congresses, House committees unanimously reported such resolutions, of which Congressman Lea, of California, was the author. In 1934, the Senate twice voted on a proposal by Senator Norris to do away with electors. The first vote was 42 yeas to 24 nays, and the next vote was 52 yeas to 29 nays. In both cases the necessary two-thirds vote was lacking. In the Eightieth Congress this resolution was reported by the Judiciary Committee of the House without a dissenting vote, and by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate with but one dissenting vote.

Under the existing system, as you know, no citizen has ever been permitted to vote directly for a President. In fact, under our present system the votes of millions of our citizens do not count in the final tally. We elect the most important officer of our Government through a hocus-pocus method called the electoral college. We vote for electors, who in turn through a dubious, confused, and technical procedure vote for one of the candidates for President. The candidate who receives the greatest number of popular votes in a particular State gets all of the electoral votes of that particular State, each State having a number of electoral votes equal to the number of its members in the Congress. If no candidate gets a majority of the electoral votes of the Nation the issue is then thrown into the Congress to be decided among the high three candidates.

Several resolutions now pending before our Judiciary Committee would do simply this: Abolish electors and the electoral college and provide that one vote directly for the candidate of his choice for President and Vice President. We retain the electoral vote, however. Under the proposed reform New York wouul still have 47 electoral votes, Pennsylvania 35, Texas 23, and so forth. We would not tamper with or change the relative voting strength of the States, or the States' absolute control of the franchise and of elections. These matters would be left to local State sovereignty and responsibility. However, a candidate would get a proportion of the electoral vote of each State in the exact ratio with his popular vote. In other words, if the Republican candidate received 33⅓ percent of the popular vote in Texas, he would get 33⅓ percent of our 23 electoral votes. You would have a direct vote on the President in terms of electoral votes. The count becomes a matter of exact mathematics. The high man wins.

Let us examine a little history of the electoral-college system and see how badly it has worked. The men who wrote the Constitution, while being good and great men as a rule, and men of wisdom, were by no means commoners. There were no farmers or small artisans among them. They were the aristocracy of the day. They distrusted, and some even despised the popular will. How to select a President was perhaps the most confusing issue to be decided by them. A dozen different plans were proposed and several plans agreed upon at one time or another, then changed. In the Virginia plan, the Pinckney plan, and the New Jersey plan, provision was made for the election of a President by the national legislature. No one seriously suggested a direct vote for President. George Mason even said that such a thing would be "as unnatural as it would be to refer a trial of colors to a blind man." Some suggestions were made that the Chief Executive be elected by the governors of the States. Finally, it was Hamilton's compromise plan that was written into the finished document. Our eighteenth century elders envisioned electors as men of great wisdom and intelligence who would meet together and select the best fitted individuals in the country to be the President and the Vice President; the man receiving the greatest number of electoral votes was to be President, the one running second high to be Vice President. They did not anticipate the creation and growth of political parties nor did they foresee any of the procedures to which resort was subsequently made.

Almost immediately the idea backfired. In the Presidential contest in 1800, Jefferson, the man intended for President, and Burr, the man intended for Vice President, turned up with a tie vote in the electoral college. The matter was then thrown into the House of Representatives for a decision. Bickering and bitterness resulted, and had Burr exerted himself in the premises he doubtless would have been selected President. Almost immediately the Congress submitted to the States, and the States ratified, the twelfth amendment to the Constitution which provided that electors should vote for a President and a Vice President. This

Three Presidents have been seated who had a lesser vote than did their leading opponents, that is, Adams in 1824, Hayes in 1876, and Harrison in 1888. In 1824, Andrew Jackson led his nearest opponent, John Quincy Adams, by a substantial popular vote and by a substantial electoral vote. However, lacking a majority over his three opponents, the election was thrown into the House of Representatives. As a result of the manipulations of Mr. Henry Clay, John Quincy Adams, the minority choice, was selected over Andrew Jackson for President. In 1876, Mr. Tilden had a plurality of over 250,000 and a natural majority of more than 78,000 over Mr. Hayes. Again the selection was left up to Congress and again through political manipulation, if not fraud, the popular will was defeated and the minority choice, Mr. Hayes, became President. In 1888, Grover Cleveland with a plurality of more than 100,000 votes and with an actual majority over Mr. Harrison was defeated. The entire career of Mr. Cleveland illustrates the foibles of the electoral college. In 1884, in the State of New York, Cleveland got 563,084 popular votes while Blaine got 562,001; with barely more than 1,000 popular votes Mr. Cleveland got all of the electoral votes of the State of New York. A change of 600 votes in New York would have elected Blaine President. In 1892 in the State of Ohio more than 1,000 voters cast their ballots for Mr. Cleveland's elector No. 1, while not voting for the remaining Cleveland electors as they intended. The result was the success of one Cleveland elector, the Republicans winning the rest. Had the 1,000 Democratic voters registered their choice correctly Mr. Cleveland instead of Mr. Harrison would have carried the State of Ohio. Every election illustrates the incongruity of the electoral college. In the 1944 campaign Governor Dewey received 2,663,484 votes in 10 States from which he received 62 electoral votes. In New York, however, he received 2,997,586 votes, considerably more than in the aforesaid 10 States combined, yet for these he received no electoral votes. In effect, nearly 3,000,000 New York Republicans had their votes counted for Mr. Roosevelt. Out of 47,000,000 popular votes, President Roosevelt received 3,000,000 more than did Governor Dewey, yet received 432 electoral votes to the Governor's 99. With 54 percent of the popular vote, Mr. Roosevelt received 81 percent of the electoral vote. In the last election Mr. Truman with 49.5 percent of the popular vote received 57 percent of the electoral vote.

Back in the first Lincoln campaign, Douglas, while receiving 74 percent of Lincoln's popular vote, received only 6⅔ percent of his electoral vote. Douglas also received three times as many votes as did Bell, yet got only one-third as many electoral votes. In the 1912 campaign, Woodrow Wilson received only 42 percent of the popular vote of the Nation, yet received 82 percent of the electoral vote. Mr. Wilson received one electoral vote for each 14,500 popular votes; while for each electoral vote received Mr. Taft got 435,000 popular votes—31 times as many popular votes per electoral vote as in the case of Mr. Wilson. In 1924, Mr. John W. Davis received 6,000,000 popular votes for which no electoral votes were received.

Now let us make some specific charges against our present system of electing Presidents, all of which would be removed under our proposed amendment.

First, existing provisions as to the choosing of electors, the manner in which their votes are cast and counted, and the deciding of elections in the Congress is an open invitation to fraud and chicanery and unless changed will some day result in disaster: While electors are morally bound to vote for certain nominees they are not legally so bound. In the very first contested election in the Nation's history, in 1796, electors who were supposed to vote for Thomas Jefferson voted instead for John Adams. As a result, Adams received 71 electoral votes to 68 for Jefferson. Jefferson might have been elected except for this abuse of discretion by said three electors. There are other instances where electors have not followed the instructions of their electorate. In the last Presidential campaign serious difficulties arose in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Texas over the selection and duties of electors. If and when a Presidential election is hotly contested and is close between leading candidates we are likely to have serious upheavals and defections within and between parties. Congress itself may even throw out legal votes or count illegal ones.

Some of the record on this point is of interest. In 1857, the Wisconsin electors were prevented by a violent snowstorm from meeting at the State capitol on the appointed day to cast their votes. Had these votes been decisive in the election the majority in Congress might have counted or have thrown them out as suited political expediency. In 1837, 6 persons who lacked the constitutional qualifications for electors had their votes counted on the grounds that they were de facto officials. In 1818, the votes of Indiana, in 1821, the votes of Missouri, in 1837, the votes of Wisconsin, were thrown out on technical grounds, involving the electoral college. In 1869, and again in 1881, Georgia's electors voted on the wrong day and their votes were not permitted to be counted. In 1873 only half of the electors of Texas ever reached the State capitol. In 1873 also, the electoral vote of the State of Arkansas was rejected by the Congress and the State disfranchised because the return certificate bore the seal of the secretary of state instead of the great seal—an article which the State did not possess at that time.

In recent campaigns we have witnessed near civil strife in several States over the manner in which electors were chosen. In some instances we have seen electors cast their votes contrary to the wishes of those selecting them. We have been lucky that no electors have died, or gone insane, or that an election was not changed by one or more electors switching their votes arbitrarily.

Thus from the bottom to the top this archaic vehicle is fraught with peril. Under the proposed method all these controversies would be avoided, because the States would have no electors to choose, and the Congress would have no election contests to decide.

Second. The electoral college confines and largely restricts national campaigns to a half dozen pivotal States: The national campaign committee and the political strategists of both parties sit down with a map of the Nation and decide where to do their work and where to spend their money. Their job is to elect Presidents. If modern scientific techniques of sampling public opinion are handled properly and with the history of past campaigns to go by, their problem is relatively simple. The seven largest States in the Union, with their electoral vote, are as follows: New York, 47; Pennsylvania, 35; Illinois, 28; Ohio, 25; California, 25; Texas, 23; and Michigan, 19. Texas, being in the solid South, counts for little. Neither party would spend any money or make any effort of consequence there, so Texas is checked off. The same is true of other States of the so-called solid South. These States are solid largely because of the electoral college. California sometimes becomes a battleground. However, by and large, it is safe to say that 75 percent of all the political efforts by both parties is concentrated in five big pivotal States, to wit: New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, and Michigan. Any party carrying all of these States has a cinch to elect a President; any party carrying a majority of them has almost a cinch. We do not say that any election has been bought, but the present system has great possibilities along those lines.

Third. The electoral college greatly restricts the field of Presidential possibilities: Certainly so important an office should have the whole Nation as a field from which to select potential Presidents. The electoral college, however, narrows the field of Presidential hopefuls almost exclusively to the aforesaid pivotal States. Since the Civil War, no President has come from the South. With the exception of Herbert Hoover, none has ever come from the West. In the last 60 years, we have had three Presidents from Ohio and three from New York. In fact, to be a governor or an ex-governor of the great State of New York, gives one the inside track of the Presidential derby. Why? The answer is obvious. The change of a comparatively few votes in the State of New York will ordinarily give to a candidate 47 electoral votes and usually the election. Only twice in the last 75 years has anyone been elected President without carrying the great State of New York. No one can dispute these facts and no one can defend the result on democratic principles.

Fourth. The electoral college permits and invites irresponsible control and domination by small organized minority groups, within the large pivotal States. It aggravates and accentuates the building up and solidification within these States of religious, economic, and racial blocs: Small, definable, minority groups, organized along religious or economic or racial lines, by voting together, can and do hold a balance of power within these pivotal States. As a result, the political strategists in both parties make special appeals to these various groups as such. These groups have become more and more politically conscious. They know their power. In many instances, they have no political alinements or philosophy as such, but are simply up for sale to the highest bidder. To encourage economic, racial, and religious group consciousness and group action, is a dangerously undemocratic practice, aside from its other evil consequences.

At the danger of stepping on some toes, let us get down to specific cases. Let us take a look at the political platforms of both major parties in the Presidential campaigns of 1944 and 1948 and see how they were built and designed to appeal to minority groups and blocs in the large pivotal States. First, both parties wrote the FEPC into their platforms. The platform makers of both parties will tell you frankly, off the record of course, that this was done as a bid for the Negro vote. There are enough Negroes in New York City, when voting en bloc, to determine often how the entire electoral vote of the State of New York is cast; enough in Philadelphia if cast in bloc to probably determine the result of an election in the State of Pennsylvania; enough in Detroit to perhaps decide the vote of the State of Michigan; enough in Chicago to carry the State of Illinois. Hence, a dangerous and radical proposal in which a majority of neither party believes was written into both platforms as political bait for a minority vote within the large pivotal States.

A second minority group that was wooed by the platform makers of both parties was the radical wing of organized labor. In the large pivotal States above mentioned, the votes controlled by the political action committee of the CIO was a tremendous, potential, political threat. The votes allegedly controlled by this organization in the large pivotal States, if cast in bloc, would be sufficient to swing the votes of such States and perhaps elect a President. Hence, both parties generally speaking wrote platitudinous provisions into their platforms concerning industrial-management relations. Both parties pussyfooted on the labor question because of organized labor's power through the electoral college.

Now, with all due deference to our many fine Jewish citizens, they constitute a third group, to whom a specific overt appeal was made in the platforms of both major parties. There are 2,500,000 Jews in the city of New York alone. When they vote even substantially en bloc, it means the balance of power in our largest State. The candidate for whom they vote carries New York State and probably the Presidency. What did the platform makers of 1944 do? Both of them wrote into their platforms specifically and without equivocation the so-called Palestine resolution, calling upon Great Britain to immediately open Palestine to unrestricted Jewish immigration. Regardless of the merits of the Zionists' cause in Palestine, this was political demagoguery and dangerous meddling with British foreign policy in the Holy Land. As a result of platform endorsements by both major parties, we passed a resolution though the Seventy-ninth Congress calling upon England to open up Palestine to unrestricted Jewish immigration. Within a few weeks after this resolution was passed, England asked us if we were ready and willing to back up our request with the Army and the Navy if she got into war. We stuck our noses into British foreign policy for purely political reasons and to the detriment of all of our citizens, Jewish and otherwise.

Then there are numerous other minorities pressure groups within these large pivotal States to whom continuous political overtures are made by the strategists of both parties. There are more than 1,000,000 Italians in New York City. There are 2,000,000 Irish, many of whom are still politically conscious where Ireland is concerned. There are 500,000 Poles and other large racial groups. Because of the electoral college, the American Labor Party and the Communist Party in the State of New York have power and trading position out of all proportion to their numbers, to say nothing of their merit. It is entirely possible that because of this political strait-jacket, the electoral college system, that said American Labor Party or the Communist Party will determine some day soon who will be the President of the United States. Of late, we have become rightly alarmed over the activities of the Communist Party in the United States. Strange to say, this party has its greatest following and influence in the aforesaid large pivotal States. This party and its fellow travelers are shrewd political manipulators. What grim irony it would be if they should swing the balance of power and be responsible for the election of a President of the United States. Again, mention might be made of the undue power and influence given to the big city political machines through the electoral college. Through, and because of the electoral college, a few big cities have elected and will probably continue to elect Presidents of the United States. It is largely within these big cities that the racial, religious, and economic blocs are found and in which they operate.

Now, please understand, I have no objection to the Negro in Harlem voting and to his vote being counted, but I do resent the fact that both parties will spend a hundred times as much money to get his vote, and that his vote is worth a hundred times as much in the scale of national politics as is the vote of a white man in Texas. I have no objection to a million folks who cannot speak English, voting, or to their votes being counted, but I do resent the fact that because they happen to live in Chicago, or Detroit, or New York, that their vote is worth a hundred times as much as mine because I happen to live in Texas. Is it fair, is it honest, is it democratic, is it to the best interest of anyone in fact, to place such a premium on a few thousand labor votes, or Italian votes, or Irish votes, or Negro votes, or Jewish votes, or Polish votes, or Communist votes, or big-city-machine votes, simply because they happen to be located in two or three large, industrial pivotal States? Can anything but evil come from placing such temptation and such power in the hands of political parties and political bosses? They, of course, will never resist the temptation of making undue appeals to these minority groups whose votes mean the balance of power and the election of Presidents. Thus, both said groups and said politicians are corrupted and the Nation suffers.

Fifth. The electoral college deprives great masses of our citizens of the educational benefits of national campaigns and lessens their concern in national affairs: Most of our citizens outside of the great pivotal States never see a Presidential candidate or a campaign speaker, and never hear a campaign speech except by radio. Neither the platforms nor the speeches are designed to appeal to them. Furthermore, millions in these areas refrain from voting in general elections, knowing that to do so is futile, since their votes will have no bearing on results.

Sixth. The electoral college places unconscionable burdens and temptations upon a President elected by it. A President starts out heavily obligated to the organized minority pressure groups in the great pivotal States and to the political machines, often the big-city machines, that were most responsible for his election. Again, there are those who, with great logic, contend that by keeping the political machines and the minority pressure groups of the large pivotal States in line, a President can easily reelect himself if not actually perpetuate himself in office. Further, the political satellites and those who benefit from his tenure of office are constantly urging him to do this very thing. Certainly, a President is constantly under great temptation to devote undue attention to, and to confer undue favors upon, these strategic political areas at the expense of and to the detriment of the rest of the country. I certainly would not accuse any President of playing cheap politics but no President should be subjected to the harassment of groups which under the electoral-college system hold such disproportionate political influence and power.

Now, let me discuss briefly some of the main arguments against our proposed amendment. While a vast majority of our political scientists, legal scholars, and serious students of government agree that our present system is dangerously defective, they do not agree upon proposed remedies. Some favor electing Presidents by a direct vote of the people. A direct-vote method raises all of the issues between the large States and the small States, and such an amendment could never be ratified. Again, it would destroy State sovereignty in the matter of national elections. It would aggravate rather than alleviate sectional differences. It would reduce all States to the lowest common denominator. For example, all States would have to lower their voting age to 18 to be on a parity with Georgia. Again, in a sectional controvery, New York might vote their dogs, cats, and dead grandmothers, and Texas would retaliate by doing the same thing. Each State would be accusing the other of fraud in piling up big votes and each would probably be correct in such charges. Under our proposal, it is of no concern to Texas how many vote in New York and of no concern to New York how many vote in Texas. New York would still have 47 electoral votes, divided, however, in the exact ratio in which they were cast. Texas would still have 23 electoral votes, divided, however, in the exact ratio in which they were cast.

Another argument against doing away with the electoral college is that it would destroy the two-party system. Our reply is that it would have the reverse effect and that our major parties under the proposed amendment would succeed or fail on real merit and not upon their success in juggling or manipulating the archaic, undemocratic vehicle known as the electoral college system. Again, some submit statistics trying to show that the proposed amendment would favor one or the other of the major parties. We submit that no truthful statistics on such a score can possibly be offered. For example, under our proposed amendment, had it been in effect during the last campaign, Governor Dewey might possibly have been passed over by the Republican party for some other nominee. Furthermore, the Republican ticket doubtless would have polled at least a million more popular votes in the so-called solid South. Nothing could be more nonpartisan than the proposed amendment. It would be absolutely fair to all political parties. It would give our two great major parties new life and vigor. It would free them of the leeches and parasites that now cling to the backs of each. It would make them in truth and fact national parties, not sectional parties appealing to prejudice, passion, and bias. Each party would then write its platform and make its appeal on national rather than sectional bases.

To summarize and generalize the affirmative arguments for the proposed amendment: We are convinced that the safety and welfare of this Nation demand the abolition of the electoral college system of electing Presidents. This system now denies a majority of our people any effective voice in the election of Presidents. The proposed amendment would remove the overpowering incentive in the present system to coddle and corrupt organized minority groups in the pivotal States, since under the proposed amendment, there would be no pivotal States. The proposed change would remove the incentive to buy those who may be for sale to the highest bidder, because their votes would not mean a balance of power and the election of a President. Under the proposed change, there would be little or no compulsion or incentive for fraud and chicanery in national campaigns. Such campaigns would no longer be sectional. The general welfare would then become a party's paramount concern. Principles would then inevitably rise above politics, and statesmanship would then count for more than mere political expediency.

Let us act before it is too late.

In conclusion, and I have merely hit the high spots, the polls throughout this country show that more than two-thirds of the people want this reform; the people want the right to vote directly for President in order to have their political philosophies transferred into direct action. They are deprived of any such rights under existing procedures.

Let me suggest to my friends here that such doubts as they may have as to the merits of this resolution should be resolved in favor of the resolution. You do not amend the Constitution; the States do that if they wish. You merely give the States the right to debate and decide the issue. Three-fourths of the State legislatures must hereafter ratify and approve this proposal if it is submitted. We ought to submit it to them for their consideration.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, will not the gentleman yield himself a little more time to explain just exactly how this method would work if the resolution and the amendment proposed by the resolution should be adopted?

Mr. GOSSETT. I appreciate my friend's request, but all time has been allotted. Subsequent speakers will do that. I thank you very much.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, obviously 40 minutes is not enough to deal adequately with a constitutional amendment of as far-reaching importance as the one with which we are forced to deal in that short time today. The fault for that does not lie with those who oppose it.

Many of the arguments made in favor of this amendment I agree with. I agree with many of the objectives sought to be achieved. Those objectives which are desirable could very easily be accomplished.

We can abolish the electoral college, we can give individual citizens a constitutional right to vote in Presidential elections, we can abolish the unit vote in the House of Representatives when an election is thrown into the House, all without endangering our political system.

We cannot, however, make the major change which this amendment would make without disastrous results, in my opinion. That change is to divide the electoral votes of each State in proportion to the division of the popular vote for President in that State. In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, the effect of that change would be, first, to reduce the Republican Party to impotence; second, to change the Democratic Party entirely in character and to deliver it permanently into the control of the conservative southern wing of that party, with the resulting destruction of any chance for a program of civil rights on a Federal level, with impairment of the rights of minorities generally, and with a definite set-back to the legitimate interests of organized labor.

In addition to those effects, which would, in themselves, be very bad for our two-party system, the two-party system, in my judgment, would further be deeply harmed by removing two of the most important pillars which now support it.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] will develop more fully the effect of this change on the Republican Party. Suffice it for me to say that it is quite clear in my mind, and competent statisticians and experts in this field have given it as their judgment, that if this change were adopted, under present voting practices and habits, the Republicans would have to get between 52 and 54 percent of the popular vote in order to elect a President, a handicap it would be practically impossible to overcome.

It is said, of course, that this would open up the South to the two-party system, that the Republicans would have a chance to get votes there which they now do not have a chance to get. I suggest to you that is just an idle dream. It would take more than a little personal campaigning by a Republican candidate for President in the South to change existing voting habits in that area.

And if the Republicans did begin to make headway in the South I confidently predict they would not do so for long. Do you recall what happened when the Populist movement raised its head in the South? Restrictive legislation was promptly enacted, restrictions of all sorts were placed around the franchise and the Populist movement was kept out of the South. Mr. Speaker, so it would be here. Additional restrictions would be put on the franchise and the Republicans would be kept out of the South.

There is no chance to get a substantial Republican vote in the South for many, many years to come. Where would southern Republican votes come from? We cannot get votes by appealing to the Negroes and other disfranchised groups. They are not and will not be allowed to vote.

And the Republicans, traditionally the party of civil liberties, cannot appeal to the conservatives in the South. If, God forbid, they should attempt it, they would lose the support of the minority groups in the great States of the North, and the people who have the vote in the South would not vote Republican in any event. Why should they change?

It is not just the Republicans who would be hurt. The Democratic Party itself would be badly hurt, and all liberal movements would be badly hurt if this change should be adopted. The forces which now control the Democratic Party in the South would then control the entire Democratic Party. The balance of power in this country would be swung from the northern pivotal States to the conservative South.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself two additional minutes.

Mr. Speaker, if this provision had been in effect in the last election, the electoral margin given by the State of Georgia alone would have been larger than the combined electoral margin given by either party by the 11 most populous States in this country outside the Solid South. Can anyone doubt that with power like that the South would regain control of the Democratic Party, dominate its conventions, dictate its platforms, choose its candidates.

Under these conditions, civil rights would have no chance whatever. That is not my view only. In the committee record, in my minority report, you will find evidence from the southern press substantiating my views. And Charles M. LaFollette, a former Member of this House, and a great liberal, has asserted that this was the most cleverly concealed weapon American reaction has yet used in its fight for control of American politics. If a single liberal voted for this change, he would commit one of the greatest errors in his experience and one which he would always regret.

The Republicans, the minority groups, and the liberals have been chided for being selfish about this thing. It has been said that their selfish interest ought to be yielded to the larger good. But where is the larger good? It does not exist.

Mr. Speaker, the considerations I have mentioned would in themselves work great, perhaps, irreparable, harm to our two-party system. There are other important respects in which the proposed change would harm that system. I have only time to mention two.

The first is this. At the present time, minority groups are politically important in pivotal States. Accordingly, both major parties must recognize and protect the legitimate interests of such groups. Since this is so, such groups have no need to form special interest blocks or parties for their own protection. Their radical elements are forced to moderate their more extreme demands and the inclusion of the members of such groups into the life of the Nation has been successfully accomplished.

Of course, undue consideration should not be given to such groups. But I submit that neither major party could indulge in that practice without losing the broad base of its support throughout the country as a whole.

The second point is this. Under our Constitution as it now stands, neither party can profit by getting more than 51 percent of the popular vote in any State. This requires both parties to appeal broadly to the people of many States and many interests. It is an important factor in making both parties representative of the country as a whole, as opposed to representing merely sectional, group, or limited class interests. The late Prof. Carl Becker, of Cornell, counts this as one of the important reasons for the continued existence of our two-party system in its present form. I agree that it is. It would be eliminated by the proposed proportional division of electoral votes.

Mr. Speaker, the procedure under which this measure is being considered simply does not permit the Members of this body to give it the consideration which its importance demands. That fact alone should impel the House to reject it. I am confident the House will follow that course; that it will not lightly recommend a constitutional change which would, in my judgment, cut deeply and dangerously into the fabric of our institutions.

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, today an important proposal to amend the Federal Constitution is before the House for consideration—consideration limited to 40 minutes.

It is indeed regrettable that ample time under a rule was not made available for discussion, pro and con, of a matter as important as is this. The passage today of this resolution will result in the submission to the several States of a proposed amendment to the Constitution that will abolish the present method of electing our President and Vice President through the medium of an electoral college and will substitute in lieu thereof, an orderly procedure whereby the electoral vote of each State will be retained and tabulated for all candidates in proportion to the number of popular votes they receive in the general election. It will replace an archaic, unjust, and inequitable method of choosing our President for one that will more accurately reflect the popular will. It will result in the selection of better candidates by both parties because the whole 48 States will be the field from which candidates will be chosen, rather than merely the populous States having the large electoral vote. It will have a tendency to make two-party States out of those that are now one-party States because adherents of other national parties in those States will have an incentive to vote, knowing that their votes will be credited to and increase the percentage of the total vote of the candidates of their respective parties. It will minimize fraud in Presidential elections, because the reward of fraud—the entire electoral vote of a State—will no longer be available. It will result in an intelligent discussion of campaign issues in all States of the Union because no State can then be ignored by any of the political parties on the ground that "its vote is in the bag." It is fair to the Republican, to the Democratic, and to the minority parties.

Now let me address my remarks particularly to those who sit on my left. I am informed that some Republicans insist that this amendment will injure our party's chances. The figures for every election since the Democratic Party gained control 18 years ago, prove otherwise.

In all five of those elections there were 531 electoral votes, of which the winning candidate was required to receive 266 to obtain a majority. In 1932 Herbert Hoover, who received 39.7 percent of the popular vote, won only 59 electoral votes. This amendment would have credited him with 189.6.

In 1936 Alf Landon, who received 36½ percent of the popular vote, was given only 8 electoral votes. He would have had 175.6, under this amendment.

In 1940 Wendell Willkie received 44.8 percent of the popular vote, but it netted him but 82 electoral votes. He should have had 214.6.

In 1944 Thomas E. Dewey, who polled 46 percent of the popular vote, received 99 electoral votes. He merited 223.5.

In 1948 Mr. Dewey polled 45 percent of the popular vote, received 189 electoral votes. He was entitled to 221.4.

If any Republican opponents of this resolution can defend these figures, and the system which makes them possible, as reflecting an honest expression of the views of individual voters, I would be delighted to hear him.

In fact, the Republican National Convention of 1948 adopted a plank in its platform which reads as follows:

> We favor a revision of the procedure for the election of the President and Vice President which will more exactly reflect the popular vote.

That is exactly what this resolution does. It is our platform pledge and as one Republican I shall adhere to it.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COUDERT].

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Speaker, I regret the necessity of arising at this time to differ with my very good friend, the able gentleman from Texas [Mr. GOSSETT]. He and I are wholly in accord on our objectives. In view of the circumstances, however, under which this resolution is coming before the House, I feel it incumbent upon me to rise to call the attention of the Members to the fact that this is not the only alternative before this House for the system which the gentleman from Texas so soundly criticizes.

Some time ago House Joint Resolution 414 was introduced by me as an alternative method for amending the Constitution with respect to the election of Presidents. House Joint Resolution 414 has the support of very respectable authority. It was supported by Jefferson, Madison, Hamilton, Story, and all of the founding fathers and the men that immediately followed them, and it is supported as late as today in the newspapers by such distinguished commentators as Messrs. Krock, Lippmann, and a host of university experts such as Professor Corwin, who edits our own constitutional volume which is gotten up by the Library of Congress. The resolution very simply would provide for the election of electors in precisely the same fashion as we now elect Members of Congress, to wit, one elector for each congressional district and two at large to represent the Senators.

Briefly, my resolution encompasses all of the objectives sought by the Lodge-Gossett resolution—every single one of them—without falling into the pitfalls that the Lodge-Gossett resolution would lead us into, to wit, unlimited growth of splinter parties and ultimately the election of minority Presidents.

If the Gossett resolution should fail, I shall press for action upon House Joint Resolution 414.

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HAYS].

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe any Member of the House can defend the present system. We are not choosing between the alternative offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COUDERT] and the present system, but between the present system and this constructive plan advanced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GOSSETT] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. It is not presented by the Committee on the Judiciary as a perfect plan. It will be a long time before we work out the kind of machinery for democratic government which can be regarded as perfect.

The present plan permits so many acts of irregularity, as has been pointed out, and there are so many weaknesses in it, including the experience of the last election which enabled one elector to cast his vote contrary to the results of the Presidential election in his State that we must make a change. But it is not the individual electors, nor the individual voters, who lack integrity, it is the system itself.

I am convinced, with the study that I have given to this plan, that it will be a tremendous improvement. I concede that I am influenced partly by my observations as a resident of the South and of the State of Arkansas in reaching this conclusion. I am sure I have never made a statement which was freer from partisan feeling than this. Mr. Harding received 60,000 votes in Arkansas out of 150,000 votes cast in 1920. Mr. Hoover received a little larger percentage than that in 1928.

I suppose it is fair to say that out of nine electoral votes the Republicans would likely receive three votes in my State. So it is not a partisan point of view. Neither should this ever be regarded as a fight between the large States and the small States, nor between the economic interests of the Nation. This is not designed to take from the large States any advantage held by them. Only five States have a larger population than that of Texas, Mr. GOSSETT'S home, and only eight States are larger than Massachusetts, Mr. LODGE'S home. The wide support for this amendment, including the endorsement by the Committee on Political Parties of the American Political Science Association—a group of disinterested and competent students of the current problems of government—is proof that the issues cannot be defined in terms of the large States against the small, the Democratic Party against the Republican, or of the North against the South.

If I might use the remaining moments I have to make a point on the positive side, I would say that over a period of years it will lessen the influence of bloc voting, that is often a menace to democracy. I have no complex against any of the new blocs. I have welcomed their participation sometimes even as a small minority. I have never knowingly said anything to prejudice their rights. But the time has come for us to regard the damage that grows out of the use of highly organized minority influences in pivotal States, and the damage done to our election machinery and to our system of government.

There is no threat to voting rights of organized blocs in this amendment.

We could remove the damage done the system, however, by refusing to give the entire vote of the State in which they acquire great power to the candidate they favor, but confer, rather, upon the favored candidate of the organized minority only that weight in the voting which their total vote represents. The bloc vote would still be a factor. Various groups—the farmers, the industrialists, the labor unions—all would still feel that their point of view would have political weight. The candidates for President and Vice President, and the parties sponsoring them, would still consider the points of view of these groups, but they would not be accorded greater weight in the voting than their proportionate share of the total vote justified. The more populous States would not lose their advantage; they would still be battlegrounds; they would retain their proportionate share of the electoral college total. But the minorities of the larger States would, under the Gossett plan, be given their recognition and would not be disfranchised, as under the present procedures.

If adopted, this amendment would exalt the individual voter, and exalt him wherever he lives, in relation to the national group of which he is a part; first in his party—giving him a greater influence in the Republican or Democratic Party, and then as a member of the national community.

I am afraid that my good friend, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CASE], is lacking full faith in popular government. If the conservative wing of the Democratic Party in the South would gain in party counsels, then perhaps the conservatives ought to have greater weight, if our idea is correct, that this is a Government by the consent of the governed. That this is desirable or not, from the standpoint of the soundness of conservative views, is not the question. Let the people make mistakes. We can survive errors in their choice; we cannot survive mishandling of the machinery by which the choice is recorded.

John Locke, thoughtful student of government, produced an epigram worthy of our contemplation, when he said, "There can be no government of and for the people unless there be government by the people."

Democratic institutions are on trial. The Republic, a federation of States, is being tested. Concessions are made in this amendment to the States—the two-vote allotment to each—but at the base of the plan is the idea that the majority must rule and that majorities are constituted of men and women, not artificial blocs.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HERTER] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I regret extremely that a matter of such importance as a constitutional amendment should come before the House under a request for suspension of the rules which allows for only 20 minutes of debate on either side. This amendment, which bears the distinguished name of the junior Senator from Massachusetts, Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE, as well as the name of the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. GOSSETT] does not come before this House as a new matter. Four times in the last 15 years it has been approved by the House Judiciary Committee. It was approved unanimously by that committee in the Eightieth Congress when the Republicans had control of the House. However, for the first time it was voted upon the Senate this year and received a two-thirds vote of that body with 19 Republican Senators voting for it.

Today it is being objected to in this body for a number of reasons which are entirely divergent. Some Members are objecting to it because they believe that in practice it would work out in a manner harmful to the Republican Party. Others are opposed to it because they feel that it would work out in a manner to strengthen anti-civil-rights Democrats in the South. Still others object to it because they feel that some other method of reforming our electoral procedure would be better than the present method.

Undoubtedly all these arguments have a certain degree of validity. However, as against these arguments, there must be weighed the excellent report of the Judiciary Committee on this amendment, prepared by the distinguished gentleman and Republican from Pennsylvania, Judge GRAHAM. In addition, the amendment has the support of many careful students of our governmental processes, who are convinced that the reforms which this amendment would institute are essential if the will of the American people is to be more nearly reflected in our presidential elections.

I personally have heard lengthy testimony given before the Rules Committee on the subject, and am convinced that the very able arguments presented by Senator LODGE on behalf of this bill override the objections. Only through an amendment of this kind can the Republican Party hope to become a truly national party, rather than a sectional party. Only through this amendment can the overwhelming influence of a few votes in the big States of the Union—an influence leading to the successive nominations of residents of those big States—be offset so that all men properly qualified may have an equal opportunity to be considered for the Presidency regardless of their domicile within the United States.

I realize that there is little chance of securing a two-thirds vote in this body, but I am convinced that even though the amendment may fail at this time, it or one very like it will be adopted before many years, and that we will then have a much more equitable method of selecting a President than the antiquated and often distorted method now employed.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4½ minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HOLIFIELD].

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, this is a dangerous bill, and the method of discussing it for only 40 minutes is ridiculous. When we debate a matter of the importance of such a measure, which will change a deep-seated principle of our constitutional Government, for only 40 minutes, it is simply ridiculous.

I want to answer in the brief time I have some of the arguments that have been made. The argument has been made that this is an advance forward in obtaining the effect of the popular vote. Let me say to you that it is such a negligible increase and it brings so many attendant evils with it that I think you should know it does not change the present disparity between the electoral and the popular vote.

One electoral vote in California represents 168,862 voters. In South Carolina it represents 17,821, or about a 10-to-1 difference. That is not changed by the Lodge-Gossett bill.

One electoral vote in California represents 395,000 people. In Nevada it represents 46,000 people, an 8-to-1 disparity. That is not changed.

So this is not a step forward in obtaining the effect of the popular vote, and let us not have anyone fool us on that.

Now, let us see what it does. Under the present electoral system the winning party has averaged, since 1932, 436 electoral votes. Under the Lodge-Gossett formula the same winning party would have averaged 306. That is from 436 down to 306. What does that mean from a practical, political standpoint? First, it means that any strong but minority bloc within either party could dictate at the party convention both the planks and the candidates. It could do this because its percentage strength would be stronger in the 306 average than in the 436 average. In other words, the minority block representing 40 or more votes, which would be the difference between 266 and 306, 266 being now the requisite majority number, could force convention concessions from the majority of the party on the threat of withdrawal of support.

Now, if the Lodge-Lucas amendment which is in the bill and which we will vote for if we vote for the bill, is accepted, it reduces the elective requirements from a majority of 50 percent or more of the electors to 40 percent. That is a 20-percent reduction in the total required. In other words, that allows a minority of the electors to elect the President. Why did they put that provision in the bill? They did it because they knew this bill would foment splinter parties. Why would it do that? Because any minority bloc within either of the major parties, if it were not appeased by a damaging concession, would step out and form its own party. What would happen? Let us take the recent election. With approximately the same number of votes cast in the South for the States' Rights Party, they would have had 38.5 electoral votes. With the same number cast in New York, Mr. Wallace's party would have had 4 electoral votes. Do you see the difference? Under the Lodge-Gossett formula, they would have had a total of a little over 40 electoral votes, which is almost 10 percent of the electoral votes.

With a little encouragement like this it would be very easy to get 10 percent of the electoral votes for a third, or for several parties, a third, a fourth, a fifth, a sixth party, and so forth. Therefore they put in the 40-percent requirement in the Lucas amendment to try to compensate for the formation of splinter parties.

The great question for us to decide is whether we want two major parties or do we want to foment small minority parties, splinter parties such as they have in France, and we know that the multiple-party situation in France has created an impotent government. France's Government can only work through party coalition agreements based on damaging compromise between the coalition parties.

I therefore, believing in a strong two-party system and fearing the effect of splinter parties upon responsible democratic procedures, urge that a "no" vote be cast against the Lodge-Gossett resolution.

REASONS WHY THE LODGE-GOSSETT PROPOSAL SHOULD BE DEFEATED

First. It is not necessary to argue that the present system of electing the President and Vice President is perfect. There are more democratic methods that can be devised. However, the Lodge-Gossett proposal is only seemingly a democratic reform. The cure it proposes is worse than the evil it seeks to remedy.

Second. Furthermore, it must be borne in mind that the present electoral college system, with all its defects, has evolved in a far different way from what the founding fathers intended. In the course of more than 150 years of political experience, we as a nation have made adjustments to this constitutional requirement which are more democratic and more in keeping with the spirit and temper of American political and social institutions.

Third. The Lodge-Gossett proposal has two classes of supporters: (a) those who have been misled by its stated altruistic aims or its apparent step toward a more democratic procedure; (b) those who hope to gain some political advantage for themselves or their political group.

Fourth. Among the latter are the southern conservatives who hope to gain control of the Democratic Party and various Republicans who hope to capture the Republican Party, in spite of overwhelming Republican sentiment for the Taft-type leadership.

Fifth. Conservative control of the Democratic Party means that that party would lose its hold on the people and lose elections. Minority groups that now work within the two-party system to accomplish their objectives, in the absence of a Democratic Party under liberal control, would seek alternatives to political impotence and frustration by forming their own political parties. Such parties would tend to follow along sectional, class, and race lines. Examples, Dixiecrat, Wallace Progressive, or a potential Labor Party movement.

Sixth. The major indictment, therefore, of the Lodge-Gossett proposal is that it would encourage a multiplicity of political parties and intensify sectional, economic, and class conflicts. It poses the real possibility of drastic changes in the American political system, and I am persuaded to believe that in the guise of a political reform the Lodge-Gossett proposal would sound the death-knell of the two-party system.

Seventh. Consider that under the Lodge-Gossett proposal the Dixiecrat and Wallace Parties, during the 1948 elections, would have gained almost 10 percent of the electoral votes. With the incentive that this measure would provide for the formation of splinter parties, a total of more than 20 percent of the electoral votes going to such parties would likely throw the election into the Congress.

Eighth. It is not far-fetched to say that under the Lodge-Gossett proposal, congressional election of Presidents would become the ordinary procedure, certainly a long step backward. Under the present electoral system, no election has been thrown into the House for more than 120 years.

Ninth. Incentive is given to the formation of splinter parties by the Lodge-Gossett proposal because it results in the serious upward distortion of the electoral influence of such parties. The Dixiecrat Party, for instance, would have gained 38.5 electoral votes under the Lodge-Gossett formula.

Tenth. A multiplicity of parties leads to coalition government with all the attendant evils and inherent instability of such governments, as exemplified by France.

Eleventh. The Lodge-Gossett proposal would bring the two major parties into closer electoral balance. Under majority rule there is no inherent virtue in a closely balanced election. Look at Britain, where uncertainty and paralysis are the results of a failure to have a decisive majority. The surplusage of electoral votes that goes to the winning party under the present American system helps to give punch and decisiveness to a party victory and compensate for the narrow margin of winning popular votes. Party responsibility is actually enhanced by the compensation of added electoral votes.

Twelfth. Our Federal Government has many constitutional departures from popular democracy in the strict sense. If the proponents of the Lodge-Gossett amendment are serious about achieving more democratic government, they should be willing to do many things that they are not doing. Many who favor this amendment do not favor poll-tax repeal; they do not favor ways and means of increasing the political participation of Negroes in the South; they are not interested in redressing the discrimination suffered by the large States in the ratio of electors to voters.

Thirteenth. Standing by itself, the Lodge-Gossett amendment not only fails to remedy the defects alleged, but it opens the door to undesirable political consequences which threaten to disrupt our two-party system of government and to introduce all the ills of multiple party division and irresponsible coalition government.

Lodge-Gossett argument: Lodge-Gossett formula is more representative of the popular vote.

Rebuttal: While theoretically this may be partially sustained, the improvement is negligible and does not attack the basic cause of present disparity between the electoral method and a true popular-vote method. For example:

Present system:	Voters
1 electoral vote, California 1948---	160,862
1 electoral vote, South Carolina 1948	17,821
	People
1 electoral vote, California 1948--	395,040
1 electoral vote, Nevada 1948-----	46,667
Lodge-Gossett system----------The same

Conclusion: Argument that Lodge-Gossett formula is a more accurate reflection of popular vote is fallacious, because the basic method of electoral representation remains unchanged.

INCREASED IMPORTANCE OF SECTIONAL OR CLASS GROUPS WITHIN MAJOR PARTIES AND AS SEPARATE SPLINTER PARTIES

Under the present electoral system the winning party has averaged since 1932, 436 electoral votes. Under the Lodge-Gossett formula the same winning party would have averaged 306.

As 266 is the required winning majority, we see that the margin of victory would have been reduced from 170 to 40 votes.

What does this mean from a practical political standpoint? First, it means that any strong but minority bloc within either party could dictate at the party conventions both planks and candidates. It could do this because its percentage strength would be stronger in a 306 average than in a 436 average. In other words, a minority bloc representing 40 or more votes could force convention concessions from a majority on the threat of withdrawal of support.

If the Lodge-Lucas amendment which is in the bill is accepted which reduces the elective requirement from 50 percent to 40 percent of the electoral votes, a minority bloc within a party becomes even more powerful.

Second, if minority blocs within a major party are not appeased, they will be likely to withdraw, form splinter parties, and wield their new-born effectiveness in the national elections. The Lodge-Lucas amendment reducing the elective requirement 20 percent is proof positive that splinter parties will flourish and election by 51 percent of the electoral votes will be unlikely if not impossible.

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER].

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, the Constitution of the United States is a venerable and honored instrument. Every man and woman who is a Member of Congress swears to uphold it. But it was not a perfect instrument when it was drafted, and with all due respect I suppose we can say today that it is not a perfect instrument. As evidence of the fact that it was not a perfect instrument there have been more than a score of amendments attached to the Constitution; and, as rather conclusive evidence that it is still not thought perfect by everyone, we are considering today a constitutional amendment.

One of the most controversial subjects in the Constitutional Convention was that of the method of selecting the President of the United States. It was hoped by the idealists who were members of the Convention that partisan politics could be eliminated from the selection of the Chief Executive, and great and elaborate precautions were set up in the Constitution to avoid partisanship in the election of the Chief Executive through the electoral college. That plan worked pretty well until about 1820 when the last of the members of the Constitutional Convention was elected President, James Monroe. Immediately after that the electoral college became the instrument of partisan politics, and it is so today.

Mr. Speaker, the most persuasive argument to me, in favor of the proposed amendment, is that it will eliminate, or will tend to eliminate from our Presidential campaigns the undue emphasis which is placed upon the great centers of population. Always the prize of the compaigns, always the prize is the great electoral vote in the heavily populated States like New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, and California. Because there is such a great and glowing prize of a large number of electoral votes held before the campaign committees, most of the energy of the campaigns is concentrated in those great centers of population.

This amendment would tend, it seems to me, to transfer some of that campaigning energy from the States with the larger electoral votes to some of the States with fewer votes and lesser population.

Because of the fact that at the present so much energy is used in the larger States, because of the larger prizes of electoral votes, those States have become the battlegrounds for the Presidential campaigns. And it has followed that the various minority groups who may swing elections, have become the object of those campaigns thus distorting the real issues into those affecting those minorities only. Always the battleground and the battle issues are planned to capture the larger States and to please the minorities who hold the balance of voting power in those States.

There are scores of arguments both for and against this proposal. Obviously there is not time under a suspension of the rules to discuss, or even mention all of them. But electoral-college reform has been a subject of discussion and debate for many years; and the Members of this body and the public at large is well familiar with the arguments.

Let us remind ourselves that what we are voting on is to permit the people of the States through their various legislatures, to determine whether this change in the selection of the President is to be made. By our affirmative vote today we only give them that right. The ultimate determination is to be made by three-fourths of the States. We only give them today the right to make that decision.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have permission to extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, the Constitution of the United States takes no cognizance of parties and it is because of this that the present method of electing the President is not altogether satisfactory. The Constitution provides that the President shall be chosen by electors who are chosen by the various States. It was the intention of the founding fathers that these electors should use their own discretion in picking a man. However, the electors are nominated on a straight party ticket and always vote for their party's candidate—Dixiecrat electors sometimes do not follow this custom. It happens, therefore, that the Presidential candidate in any State who gets more than one-half of the popular vote or a plurality of the popular vote gets all of the electoral votes. As a consequence, it is possible for a man to become President even though he has less than a majority of the popular votes and even though he has less popular votes than his unsuccessful competitors.

In order to make this proposition clear, let us assume there are three States each with 100,000 popular votes and each with 10 electoral votes. Let us further assume that there are just two candidates for the President, whom we will call candidates A and B. Candidate A wins the first State by 50,001 votes and wins 10 electoral votes. Candidate B loses the first State, receiving 49,999 popular votes, but no electoral votes. In the second State, candidate A wins in the same fashion and candidate B loses in the same fashion. In the third State, candidate B wins the entire State by a clean 100,000 popular votes and acquires 10 electoral votes. It is clear that candidate A wins the election with 100,002 popular votes and 20 electoral votes, and candidate B loses the election with 199,998 popular votes and only 10 electoral votes. In the history of the United States only two Presidents, Hayes and Harrison, have won elections with less popular votes than their defeated opponents. In all other elections the winning candidate has had a majority or a respectable plurality.

The Lodge proposal aims to do away with the possibility of the President being elected by the minority or a small plurality of the popular votes by allotting electoral votes in each State in proportion to the popular votes. Thus in the State of Pennsylvania, the Republicans in the last election would have received approximately 19 electoral votes, the Democrats approximately 16, and the Progressives approximately 1. As you know, what happened in the last election was that the Republicans got all of the electoral votes in Pennsylvania.

The Lodge proposal provides that in case no candidate gets at least 40 percent of the electoral votes, the election shall be determined by the House and Senate seated together and voting as individuals, not as States. This is certainly a more democratic method than the present arrangement which provides that if no candidate gets a majority of the electoral college, the House of Representatives shall decide the issue by a majority vote with each State delegation having one vote.

The Lodge proposal will effectively draw the political eye-teeth of all independent voters, including the Negro voter, as far as presidential elections are concerned. The political importance of independent voters exists in presidential, gubernatorial, and senatorial elections. In these elections independent voters can swing the doubtful States into either one party column or the other. In New York in the last presidential election, the Progressive Party seceded from the Democratic Party and took enough votes to drop the State in the Republican ranks.

Since 1909, in ever-increasing numbers, the Negro has been migrating out of the South to the large industrial States of the North where he has gone largely into heavy industry. He has migrated to those States with a heavy industrial population and consequently large electoral votes. It also happens that most of these States are doubtful States and pivotal States in presidential elections. A shift of from 2 to 4 percent of the votes in any one of these States will carry it for the Democratic or Republican candidate. It is possible to win a presidential election by carrying these large doubtful States. It is for this reason that Mr. Truman has been willing to stand up to the Dixiecrats. If the Lodge proposal goes through, the Negro vote and the vote of other minority, national, and religious groups will no longer be important in the great pivotal States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, California, West Virginia, Kentucky and Tennessee. Instead of being able to throw these great States to one column or the other, the Negro will be effective in only approximately 15 electoral votes—rough guess. Of course, the same is true of most independent voters and voters of religious and national groups who are for the most part liberal and espouse the Negro cause.

First, it would appear that the Lodge proposal has been brought forward because his following is convinced that the Republican Party is going to be a large minority party in the great pivotal industrial States. Mr. LODGE therefore hopes to pick up a proportionate share of the electoral votes in the big pivotal industrial States and to win by adding to these votes the electoral votes of the traditionally Republican States in the North and the West.

Secondly, the Democratic Party is expected to be plagued by a large number of splinter groups such as the Dixiecrat Party, the Liberal Party, the Labor Party, and so forth. It is for this reason that this proposal requires only 40 percent of the electoral college for election. The Republican Party can get 40 percent of the popular vote.

Thirdly, the Gossett proposal undoubtedly seeks to destroy the Democratic Party. The Democratic Party has become a liberal party because of the influence of the big pivotal industrial States which have been falling into the Democratic column. As a result of this occurrence, Franklin Roosevelt in 1936 was able to get rid of the two-thirds rule for Presidential nomination in the Democratic Party, a purely southern requirement. Under the Gossett proposal the electoral vote of the great Northern States would be split but the solid South would continue to deliver a solid Democratic vote. It must follow that the southern Democrats would again reestablish their power over the Democratic Party, driving liberal and independent groups out of it. No more fortuitous happening could be envisaged by conservative Republicans.

The Gossett proposal will result in a reduction of political influence for the North as a whole. Political representatives have had to pay attention to the needs of Northern States and northern political, economic, religious, and national groups because of the decisive effect of these groups in causing the blocks of electoral votes in the large Northern States to fall to one party or the other. Under the Gossett proposal each party would get its proportionate share of northern votes; consequently, the competition for the Northern States as a whole will be reduced. But it should be remembered that the political influence of the South will still remain great since it will continue to vote solidly Democratic. The importance of the South will grow in the councils of the Democratic Party and in the Nation as a whole.

For a long time persons concerned with politics have realized the essential danger of minority election inherent in the electoral-college system, but they have thought that the present system of electing the President is the only possible political counterbalance to the solid South.

A great many persons have admitted that the Gossett amendment would have a bad effect on independent, liberal, and Negro groups in the North as a whole and on the Democratic Party. But these persons have felt that one cannot logically oppose more democracy in America. It is assumed that the Lodge proposal means more democracy.

First. The Senate of the United States represents each State equally. The people of New York, 13,000,000, have only 2 Senators. The people of Delaware, 230,000, have 2 Senators. Under the present system of electing the President, the influence of the people of New York and of its dependent groups is felt. Under the Gossett proposal the influence of the people of New York would be reduced and there would be no counterbalance to the equal representation of the small States in the Senate.

Secondly, we have a Federal system of government and the Gossett proposal fails to represent States in the election of the President. While the electoral votes are to be apportioned in accordance with the popular vote in each State, the real effect of the Lodge proposal, except for the loss of fractional popular votes in each State, is to cast the United States as one great electoral district.

Thirdly, the Gossett amendment provides that a man may be elected President with only 40 percent of the popular vote. We consistently do much better than this under our present system. It is hardly a democratic proposal.

Lastly, the only offset the Negro has had to disfranchisement in the South and the southern filibuster has been his political influence in the northern pivotal States. The Gossett proposal will rob him of this political influence without enfranchising him in the South and without proposing to stop the unconstitutional filibuster.

The Gossett proposal would have a bad effect in a cumulative fashion. First of all, it will kill directly the political influence of the Negro and minority-group votes in pivotal States. Secondly, it will reduce the importance of the Northern States as a whole and the great industrial States specifically. Undoubtedly, it is in the North where the Negro and minority groups find most interest in their problems. Thirdly, it will destroy the liberal Democratic Party, for it will once again establish the power of the solid South over the Democratic Party. In the last 20 years most of the advancement of the Negro and other minority groups has come as a result of the interest of the liberal wing of the Democratic Party. Fourthly, many independent groups, liberal groups, and even labor groups will begin to take less interest in the problems of the Negro and other minorities. As far as national politics are concerned, political groups in America are formed by accretion. The Gossett proposal will have a disintegrative effect on the political groups with which the Negro and other minorities have been allied. Fifthly, the Gossett proposal will kill the influence of the great urban pivotal States. These States have had for the most part the most aggressive labor forces and have been the most powerful ones in presidential elections. They have been the doubtful States, where a swerve from 2 to 4 percent of the vote on the average has been enough to carry the State for one presidential candidate or another.

It is difficult to understand why the opposition to the Gossett amendment in the Senate came only from Mr. TAFT and his followers and from a few Democrats. There are several possible explanations. First, it is possible that White House political leadership missed the significance of the whole move. Secondly, it is possible that Mr. Truman has been seriously hurt by splinter groups—Wallaceites in the north and Dixiecrats in the South. There is no question that Mr. Truman is torn between Dixiecrats on one side and Negroes on the other. It might be that he is willing to get rid of these "splinters in his side" even at the cost of a less liberal Democratic Party. Lastly, there is evidently some feeling among labor groups that the Gossett proposal will allow labor for the first time to lump together all of its votes in the North in presidential elections. It is true that the Gossett proposal is beneficial to all large minorities, such as labor or the Republican Party. However, it seems to me that an immediate frontal political attack by labor will result in a general public reaction unfavorable to labor. Furthermore, I doubt if labor's influence under the Gossett system will be any greater than its influence under the present system. The indecisive nature of our Federal, separation of powers, check, and balance system of Government would be increased by a multiparty system.

Should the Gossett amendment get past the House of Representatives, it has an excellent chance of being adopted by the States. The southern Democrats will vote for it as a block. Solid Republican or near solid Republican States will vote for it. Generally the rural States in America will vote for it since the effect of the proposal is to decrease the influence of the great urban States. It is also obvious that a great deal of conflict exists now between urban and rural population over the question of the cost of food and the farm price support program. The large urban States constitute only 12 of the Nation's 48 States. Of these, 3 are normally Republican. Constitutional ratification requires the adoption of three-fourths of the States. The House of Representatives alone represents population and largely urban population. It is the best place, then, to fight the Gossett amendment which must be adopted by the House by a two-thirds vote.

I am not impressed with the traditional arguments that the Dixiecrats are going to try to steal the presidency in 1952, by splitting up the electoral vote and throwing the election into the House of Representatives.

The Constitution requires that the President must be chosen by a clear majority of the electoral votes. If no candidates gets this majority, the matter is decided by the House of Representatives with each State delegation having one vote. If the Dixiecrats bolt the Democratic Party in 1952, they can perhaps prevent any candidate from getting a majority of the electoral vote. The election would then be thrown into the House of Representatives. Voting as States, the Southern States would undoubtedly have more influence than if they had to rely on their electoral votes but they cannot elect a President in the House of Representatives without the support of conservative Republicans. The Constitution requires a majority vote in the House of Representatives. If the conservative Republicans and the Dixiecrats should agree on a President, it would be the last election they would win for a long time. Exactly this kind of thing happened when the Clay and John Quincy Adams forces ganged up to take the election away from Jackson. The popular reaction was tremendous. The people took the attitude that the election had been stolen. At the next election Jackson was voted in overwhelmingly. The American people cannot be tricked except now and then.

It seems to me that at most the Dixiecrats can take only nine States in an election carried out in the House of Representatives. They will probably be able to take only three or four States. What they really would like to have is the Gossett proposal, as they have shown by their vote in the Senate. Their threat in a House election of the President, I think, is insignificant.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment, the electoral college is outmoded. I would like to see the electoral college abolished and that we elect the President and Vice President of the United States by direct popular vote. Pending the time this is accomplished, I consider that to vote up this resolution is to take a step toward the abolition of the electoral college.

I support this resolution and regret that in all probability it will be overwhelmingly defeated today.

This resolution accomplishes the abolition of presidential electors and its enactment into law would permit the people of our country to vote directly for the election of a President. I favor this change in the method of counting votes. I consider that by voting up this resolution we take a step toward eliminating the always present possibility of Presidential elections being thrown into the House of Representatives.

One by one old ties have been severed—the stagecoach, tallow dips, flintlock muskets and mustache cups have gone. The electoral college should be the next to go. The makers of our Constitution did well under the circumstances to provide the electoral college, but we are now living in a different world. Were George Washington and Thomas Jefferson to arise from their graves, they would not know this Nation, nor would they recognize the world we are living in, yet we are wearing the same torn and patched old political cloak of the electoral college.

Although this resolution will be defeateed today, a good has been accomplished in that more and more people are thinking of the outmoded electoral college and of the advisability of modernizing our national system of electing our President and Vice President by doing away with the electoral college and by electing the President and Vice President by direct popular vote.

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will overwhelmingly support this resolution.

In this day and age, abolition of the electoral college ought not present a seriously controversial issue. The electoral college has long since become an anachronism for which reason and justification has disappeared.

The present system of electing the President of the United States was evolved as one of the many compromises of the Constitutional Convention. Our founding fathers of the eighteenth century envisioned presidential electors as men of unusual intelligent wisdom and judgment who would meet face to face and select the individuals best fitted to be President and Vice President; the man who received the most votes would be President; the second highest, Vice President. They obviously could not and did not foresee the vast physical growth of our Nation and did not anticipate the development of Nation-wide political parties.

It is not necessary to recite the cases of inadequacy of the existing electoral system. In three instances at least—1828, 1876, and 1888—Presidents were elected who had lesser popular vote than their leading opponents. In every election we witness the disenfranchisement of the minority voters in each of the 48 States. We see lack of interest in the majority of the States with the presidential campaigns centered in a few States of large population. We see open, and often compromising, invitations for support of small organized minority groups in pivotal States with aggravation of balance of power, political blocs.

Our Nation is deprived of outstanding candidates for President because they come from the Solid South, from rock-ribbed Republican States, or from States of small population that are "in the bag" for one party or another. Surely New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania have no monopoly on presidential talent and yet both parties have favored candidates from those and other large States in order to assure the entire electoral vote of these large pivotal States. The major campaign efforts have been confined to a few such States. The majority of our voting population thus has no direct contact with presidential contests.

These weaknesses constitute a rather severe indictment of our present electoral system. The vast majority of students of political science are agreed on the need for change. There is, however, substantial difference of opinion as to what that change shall be.

There is a comparatively small but active group who advocate direct popular election of the President and Vice President, completely disregarding State lines for election purposes. There are many practical objections to this proposal. The resolution before us today is, in my opinion, a practical solution to the problem. It would make four important changes in the existing electoral system.

First. The electoral college and the selection of persons as electors would be abolished, but the assignment of electoral votes to the State on the present basis would be retained.

Second. The people would be given by constitutional right a direct vote for presidential and vice presidential candidates. The individual States, however, would retain their present right to fix the qualifications of voters.

Third. The electoral votes of each State would be credited to the respective candidates in proportion to their popular votes within the States.

Fourth. The President and Vice President would be chosen by a simple plurality of electoral votes in place of the present majority requirement and the present necessity for election by either branch of Congress in the absence of an electoral majority would be eliminated. In event of tie, the presidential or vice presidential candidate receiving the largest number of popular votes will be chosen.

It can be stated that the plan is also a compromise just as the establishment of the existing electoral college was accomplished through compromise. Such give-and-take measures do have their virtues as the formation and continuation of the American Republic will strongly testify. One significant virtue of compromise is that it does provide a vehicle for making substantial and practical progress.

In the discussion of the instant question this consideration is important. There is widespread recognition of the practical difficulty of the adoption of a constitutional amendment to provide for the popular election of President and Vice President. It should be kept in mind that any constitutional amendment requires ratification by three-fourths of the States. It is not necessary here for us to discuss the merit or demerit of the present existence of two presidential electoral votes for each of the States to correspond to the two United States Senators from the State. Practically, it must be recognized that this provision does give a weighted advantage in electoral votes to the States of smaller population. It is a natural consequence of the compromise which provided for a bicameral national legislature, one body of which gives equal representation to all States regardless of population. It simply is unrealistic to expect the States of smaller population to vote, either through State legislatures or State conventions, to lessen their relative influence in the selection of the President. The Lodge-Gossett resolution gives the closest approximation to direct vote for President by dividing the electoral vote, as it now exists, on the basis of the popular vote within the States. It provides this advantage without reviving the historical contest between the States of larger or smaller populations.

There is a second important advantage of the proposed resolution. It preserves the right of the States to continue to fix the qualifications for their constituent voters as recognized in article I, section 2, of the Constitution. This is in keeping with the accepted concept of a Federal as contrasted to a National Government.

It is a safe assumption that each State will fix the qualifications of its voters for the best welfare of that State. Federal officials then now are, and would continue to be, elected by voters qualified under State law to vote for members of the most numerous branch of the State legislature. Direct popular vote is inconceivable unless there is to be uniform qualifications for voting throughout the Nation. Unless these qualifications were made uniform by Federal enactment, we could expect a contest among the State legislatures to lower voting qualifications. This would permit the inflation of the voting populace so as to outvote other States, where another party is presumably stronger, in national elections. Amplification of the unhealthy situation thus encouraged is unnecessary.

On the other hand, if there were to be Federal enactments to provide uniform qualifications there would exist the confusing situation of voters, on the same date and at the same polling place, being qualified to vote for some officials—State—but not others—Federal, or vice versa. Uniform Federal legislation would also involve policing of the polling places by the Federal Government.

There would be charges and countercharges of voting ineligible voters with an unhealthy increase in the moral risk of permitting fraudulent vote practices.

Under existing law and as proposed in the pending resolution, it is no concern of one State how many people are permitted to vote in another. The moral hazard of chicanery in national elections is thereby kept to a minimum.

The nationalization of our Government with centralization and concentration of power in Washington is one of the alarming trends of the last two decades. The Lodge-Gossett resolution would give the major advantages of popular election of President and Vice President but would protect the important Federal principle.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, it is extremely unfortunate that this measure comes before us under a procedure which does not permit any amendments and allows only 40 minutes for debate. A subject as important as the manner of electing the President and Vice President of our great country should not receive that kind of cursory treatment.

The present method of selecting the Chief Executive is certainly open to improvement. But the difficulty with this resolution is that it is put up to us on a take it or leave it basis without any opportunity to improve its provisions or debate them adequately. The only method of expressing opposition to this high-handed manner of handling important legislation is by voting against the measure.

In its present form, I entertain serious doubt that the passage of the resolution would strengthen the two-party system in this country as its proponents claim. Rather, in my judgment, it would weaken that system. The award of electoral votes to every candidate would tend to encourage the formation of splinter parties to represent every form of pressure group. Under our present system, all of these groups can and very properly do exert their influence in molding the policies of the two major political parties. The division, disunity, and weakness which result from the creation and encouragement of many different parties has had tragic repercussions in many foreign countries. Much of the strength and stability of our Nation and its rise to its present position of world eminence may be attributed to its firm adherence throughout the years to the two-party system. I am not convinced that this measure in its present form would be helpful in strengthening our two-party system or even continuing its effectiveness.

I also am seriously concerned over the fact that the effect of the adoption of the resolution would be to give to a few southern States a veto power over all Federal legislation out of all proportion to that which they can justly claim by virtue of population or any other factor. An incidental effect of such action would, of course, be to sound the death knell of any civil rights program.

Therefore, while I concede the necessity for an improvement in the present unsatisfactory system and am not dogmatically and stubbornly opposed to a change, I cannot support the resolution before us for the reasons I have stated.

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against this resolution. I do so because I cannot possibly justify a procedure under which we are asked to cast our votes for as far-reaching a piece of legislation, involving an amendment to the Constitution, with only 40 minutes of debate and without the possibility of even considering, to say nothing of voting upon, amendments which surely would be introduced if this matter had come to us with a rule.

There is real merit in the argument that existing situation under which the President and Vice President are elected should definitely be remedied and I hope that as soon as possible arrangements will be made which will insure the sort of consideration of such legislation which is justified and absolutely essential.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be on record as favoring this Senate Joint Resolution 2, which proposes an amendment to the Constitution of the United States for altering the present antiquated method of electing the President and Vice President.

We are today firm in our belief that every citizen has the inalienable right of a voice in his Government, yet with unreasonable adherence to outmoded precedent we illogically maintain a system that deprives hundreds of thousands of voters from having their votes count in the election of the President and Vice President of the United States.

We all know that the electoral college method of election makes it possible for one candidate to receive a majority of the popular vote yet lose the election. We even know that history has seen such a possibility become a reality. In a democracy why refuse to count a man's ballot? What excuse can be offered for perpetuating the virtual disfranchisement of voters?

This Gossett-Lodge resolution would only send this proposed amendment to the States to ratify or reject. It would give the 48 States the opportunity to express an opinion on the electoral-college system.

I hope that this measure passes for I believe it would be speedily approved by the various States. It would then mean that henceforth every individual vote would count. It would eliminate the ridiculous possibility of one man being elected President when another had received a majority of the votes cast. It would prevent organized pressure groups from exerting unfair and disproportionate influences on national elections. It would, in short, strengthen our democratic processes. I heartily commend this proposal.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of the time on this side to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I believe in all my long experience in Congress I have never had more pressure put upon me to support a bill than this one, but I cannot bring myself to support it. I do not believe the proposal will achieve the objectives we seek. Certainly this is a most astounding proposal; it apparently is supposed to make everybody happy. If it works out the way we have been promised the southern Democrats would be happy because they are led to believe that it would give them greater control over the Democratic Party and it might reestablish the two-thirds rule that the Democratic Party eliminated some years ago. In other words, they can have the veto power over the Democratic candidate.

The northern Democrats are supposed to be happy with the innovation because it would mean, of course, that the smaller States in the South, voting overwhelmingly for one party, would more than counterbalance in influence the northern States, with the result there would be no Republican elected President for a good many years to come.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. It works out, based on the last two elections, that as far as Ohio is concerned it would have about four-tenths of one electoral vote while Mississippi would have 90 times as much influence in the electoral college as Ohio, and Mississippi alone would offset the votes of six large northern States—Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Minnesota, and New Jersey.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I cannot yield at this time.

Mr. RANKIN. After all that confusion, I would like to correct the gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I do not yield.

The liberals will profit by this resolution, so it is claimed, because it would encourage the development of so-called splinter parties with the result that we might have an election where no one would have a majority of the votes. This would destroy the two-party system of Government. It would be the first step toward proportional representation and easier to drift into state socialism.

The Republicans are told that they will win more Presidential elections in the future because by some slight of hand, some legerdemain, numerous Republican votes will appear overnight in the South and will be counted proportionately under the proposed electoral system.

Verily, this is a political Pandora's box—if you can believe all that is claimed for it. Just how all these righly contradictory things can happen by adopting this amendment I fail to see.

Laying aside the merits or demerits of this proposed amendment for a moment, I would like to discuss the method by which we are considering this measure.

For years this great legislative body of which we are Members has been under constant fire for alleged lack of thoroughness in its operations, alleged lack of statesmanship in its deliberation, and alleged lack of knowledge of what it was doing. The critics of Congress have laid down their barrage of criticism in the hope of destroying legislative government in this country.

Now what are we doing today? Under suspension of the rule with only 20 minutes of debate on each side, with only a total of 40 minutes in all, we are attempting to amend the greatest political instrument in the world—the Constitution of the United States, a document that has only been amended 21 times in the 163 years of its existence and then only after the most serious deliberations, extensive debate, and years of public discussion.

And why do we propose to amend it? The answer is that we are going to change, to completely revamp, to drastically alter the entire election machinery by which we have successfully filled the highest office in this land for 163 years.

And this House has been asked to do this in 40 minutes.

I say to you that if we take this far-reaching step today, with only 2 or 3 days' notice and with the outrageous limit of 40 minutes on deliberations and debate, we will have done more to undermine the integrity and respect of this Congress than anything that has ever been said, uttered, or written by the Socialists, Communists, and other enemies of representative government.

My pride in the House and loyalty to representative government cannot permit me to believe we will act so hastily.

I would vote against this suspension if for no other reason than the contemptuous fashion in which it has been brought before the House. In my 26 years of service I never saw the right of suspension used to amend the Constitution of the United States.

In my remaining few minutes I want to discuss this proposed amendment itself.

I want to address my remarks to Republicans, to northern Democrats, and to southern Democrats alike. I want you to weigh the effect of what you are doing to this country if you adopt this amendment.

This amendment proposes that we abolish the existing electoral college system and substitute for it a proportional counting of the votes cast for the President.

First. By the very wording of this proposed amendment it would not only be possible but highly probable that in the near future we would have Presidents occupying the White House who had been elected by a minority of the total popular vote. This amendment, by virtue of a provision which requires the winning candidate to receive at least 45 percent of the popular vote, is implicit in its implications that majority elections will eventually almost disappear.

As this proposed system is constituted the electoral votes now cast by the great States of Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Michigan, New Jersey, Minnesota, Wisconsin, California, and others with comparable populations, and with the two-party system fully in effect, would be virtually neutralized. For example, the great State of Ohio, which would retain its 25 electoral votes under this proposal, would in reality actually lose approximately half of them.

Let us see how it would work. A plurality of 100,000 or 150,000 votes is considered large in Ohio where the Republican and Democratic Parties are almost equally balanced. Now let us suppose that the Republicans carried Ohio by 125,000 votes. Under the amendment the Republicans would get approximately 13 of Ohio's electoral votes and the Democrats 12, and Ohio would cast one electoral vote for the President.

In the South where the two-party system is all but nonexistent, the effect would be exactly the opposite. A State like Alabama would in all probability cast all 11 of its electorial votes for one candidate, or at the best 10 of them.

Thus Ohio with a population of 8,000,000 would cast one electoral vote, while Alabama with a population of about 2,800,000 would cast 10 or 11 electoral votes.

This example can be carried out almost across the entire North. It has been calculated that had this system been in effect President McKinley, although he had a majority of the popular vote, would actually have lost to William Jennings Bryan, the Democratic nominee, because the southern vote under the amendment would have far outweighed, few as they were, the heavy pluralities piled up by McKinley in the North.

The truth is that under this proposed amendment the election of our Presidents in the future, at least until there is a vigorous two-party system in the South, will be decided in the South and solely in the South.

I would like to ask the Members of this House, and particularly those from the Northern States, how they can go home and say that with only 40 minutes of deliberation, they changed the method of electing the President of the United States.

To the southern Members of this House I want to say this:

If there is merit in this proposed amendment, its merit is completely destroyed by the existence of the one-party system in the South. If the South really is sincere in its support of this amendment, it must realize that it has the cart before the horse. It must realize that the proposal could have a place only in a two-party political structure. We must just organize a two-party system in the South to maintain equal representation.

I do not hold to any fetish and belief that the existing electoral college cannot be improved. In fact, I will welcome the day, and I hope it comes soon, when by virtue of the operation of the two-party system in every one of our 48 States, we shall be able to consider a more enlightened and a more workable method of electing the President of the United States.

But do not today in a 40-minute session without the opportunity of any real debate cast the die that could lead to the loss of our two-party system of government. Our two-party system has preserved the essential balance in our representative form of government so necessary to the freedom, dignity and happiness of every single American. It must be preserved. You can help preserve it by voting against the suspension of the rules.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this amendment would make it impossible for the election of a Republican President for a good many years. I want to say to those who claim this is a part of the Republican platform that I had the privilege of being permanent chairman of the last Republican National Convention. I know what was in that platform. We never said we favored this particular bill. We said we would amend the electoral college in order to make it more responsive to the popular vote of the Nation. That was the Republican pledge, and we who believe in keeping our party pledge can vote against this resolution today in good faith. If its purpose is to amend the electoral college system, I say bring in the legislation in the right way and not under suspension of the rules where we cannot dot an "i" or cross a "t."

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I say to the gentleman from Massachusetts who has just addressed the House that the Committee on the Judiciary tried to get a rule from the Committee on Rules. We have been struggling with that committee for months in order to persuade them to grant a rule, but they were adamant and refused to give us a rule so that we could debate this most momentous question leisurely, unhurriedly, and adequately.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, now you are going to ask the House to do it when you could not get a rule.

Mr. CELLER. What choice was left to us?

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. There were about five other choices, including the 21-day rule.

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, in fairness to the Committee on Rules, I think it ought to be said that the understanding within the committee has been to the effect that whenever the supporters of this proposal reached the conclusion that it would be felt safe to submit this question to the House for action, that the committee would grant a rule on the bill.

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, of course, I am opposed to this resolution.

The country is not suffering because of the Constitution; that is not what is wrong with it. It is suffering more from the lack of applying the Constitution.

I wish I had time to comment on the statements that have been made in this debate; but my time is very limited. I believe the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CASE] arrived at the right conclusion, but he gave more wrong reasons for it than any other man I ever heard speak the same length of time on this floor; and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] went far afield in his reference to Mississippi.

The South would not profit by the passage of this resolution; and I doubt if it would be approved by the legislature of a single Southern State when they understood it. It would only tend to bring about confusion; and would probably result in such political chaos and demoralization as the South went through during the dark days of Reconstruction.

As I said, we are getting along very well so far as the Constitution of the United States is concerned. Let us try to get back to the Constitution, and not get any further away from it, or try to change it every time some fellow imagines he has a bright idea, and wants to try something new.

This provision of the Constitution, relative to the electoral college, was worked out and adopted by the wisest group of statesmen the world has ever known. It has been accepted by our predecessors for more than 160 years. To change it now by the adoption of this amendment might result in chaos and confusion, the lack of which we have not seen during your lifetime and mine.

I hope the resolution is voted down.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BRYSON].

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, after thorough study, I find myself in accord with Senate Joint Resolution 2 as presented to the Senate by the Republican Senator LODGE, of Massachusetts, and House Resolution 2 as now pending before the House, having been introduced by my colleague, Representative ED GOSSETT, Democrat from Texas. I sincerely hope that the House will soon pass on this all-important question so as to give the States the opportunity to indicate their wishes.

One of the most interesting institutions of American Government is our much-discussed electoral college. Even though there are many citizens who are not sufficiently dissatisfied with its operation to support its abolition or even the fundamental reform of its structure and functions, yet there is today a strong belief, both in and out of the Congress, that this extraordinary method of choosing our Chief Executive is far from satisfactory. The strongest evidence of the attitude of the Congress and the public has been offered during this session by the passage by the Senate of the proposed constitutional amendment—Senate Joint Resolution 2—and by the strong popular approval of this action. We now have this resolution before us, and it is my firm belief that we will be strengthening our form of government and carrying out the wishes of the people of the country if we act favorably upon it before we adjourn.

Too much of the discussion concerning the resolution has gotten away from the one real question which we must answer: Does the proposal offer assurance that a better method of electing a President and a Vice President will be instituted? All other questions—even though some of them raise important issues—are secondary. The effects on the two major parties, the effects on potential candidates in the 1952 election, the shifts in power between the various sections of the country, the changes in influence of conservative and liberal elements within each of the major parties, the potential creation of splinter parties holding balances of power which they do not possess under the present electoral college system, these, and other questions, are being discussed at great length. In fact, they are distracting our attention from the main issue and I wish to draw debate in the Congress back to it. We need to consider only the one point: does the proposed amendment promise a better method of electing a President than our present unsatisfactory process?

The American Presidency is an office with peculiar characteristics. It is an interesting coincidence that the two most powerful single officers in the two great democracies, the United States and England, are chosen indirectly. In both cases, however, the direct influence of the voter is closer in fact than it appears to be in the constitutional provisions for the choice of the Chief Executive.

A short time ago England held an election. Atlee and Churchill ran as candidates for seats in the Parliament representing single member districts, as you and I do. Yet, it was no secret to any voter in any constituency that he was actually choosing between two parties, headed respectively by Atlee and Churchill, even though he expressed that choice only by voting for a member of one of the two parties running for the seat in Parliament representing the voter's own constituency. Thus a vote for a Labor Party candidate in any district was potentially influential in making Atlee the Prime Minister; a vote for a Conservative candidate worked in the direction of giving that office to Churchill.

The American system of choosing a President is also indirect in theory. We vote for lists of electors nominated by the political parties in the several States, but we do this to express a choice between party candidates for the Presidency. How many voters there may be who understand their own action, no one knows. How many times have you heard a campaign speaker plead with voters to cast their ballots for Republican or Democratic electors? All the speeches I ever heard asked for votes for Roosevelt or Truman or Dewey or Landon or some other candidate. I know that voters believe that they are voting for these persons as, in fact, they are.

This very extraordinary process, referred to as "the myth of the electoral college," has no place in the American system of government. You know the story of its origin in the fears of the authors of the Constitution that the people could not be trusted to act directly in their choice of a national chief executive. That those fears were groundless has been demonstrated by our history. If we were to draft a new constitution for a Twentieth Century United States there is no doubt in my mind that we would provide for some form of direct election for president. Why would we continue the use of a process which is so difficult for citizens to understand? Why confuse voters unnecessarily when it is already far too much for most of them to understand the operations of our complex government, the policies of our several political parties, and numerous candidates for office? The burden of proof falls upon the advocates of a formality such as the present constitutional provision for election of the President. Unless they can demonstrate that it is not a mere formality, but that it has life and is effective in operation, we should not continue to complicate the situation to no purpose.

But the present electoral college method of electing the President is not merely obsolete and confusing to voters. In my thinking on this problem, there is a far more important reason for adopting the proposed amendment now before us. The Democratic philosophy has no place in it for the winners-take-all method of determining the electoral college of a State. We claim to believe that minority parties and groups, although they may be outvoted on a particular measure, have the right to recognition. Yet not a single Democratic vote in Maine and not a single Republican vote in Mississippi is counted for the Demrocratic or the Republican presidential candidate at the present time. Even worse is the loss of the great minorities—sometimes Republican, sometimes Democratic—in such "close" States as New York and Ohio and California.

It is very easy to correct this fault and the new amendment does it by the well-established method of giving proportional weight to the majority and minority voters. If we really believe in what we repeat so emphatically and so frequently—that the two-party system is an essential part of our form of government—we cannot logically support any practice which tends to weaken that system. Both of our great parties claim to be "national" parties, not urban or rural, not northern or southern. Yet this persistent discouragement of the minority party in the several States operates powerfully toward the establishment of regional parties, and we have known this for a long time.

An important byproduct of this situation is lack of voter interest and participation in States which have been completely controlled by one party over a considerable period of time. Why should a Maine Democrat bother to vote? Is it surprising that in most Southern States relatively few members of either party vote in the general election? After the southern Democrat has helped to nominate the presidential candidate of his party through his selection of delegates to the Democratic nominating convention, he knows that the majority of voters in his State will vote for the Democratic candidate and that its entire electoral vote will be cast for that candidate. The Republican Party member in a Southern State has little incentive to participate in a presidential election. We have all witnessed the tremendous interest of voters of both parties in States where party strength is closely balanced, and the presidential campaigns are addressed almost entirely to voters in those States. There can be no defense of this situation and the certainty that it would be improved under the new amendment is one of the strongest arguments in its favor.

The Senate, through a bipartisan vote, has expressed approval of Senate Joint Resolution 2. Comment throughout the country is running strongly in its favor. If the House also takes affirmative action, the proposal will go to the people of the several States as they are represented in their legislatures. Whether or not acceptance by the necessary three-fourths of the State legislatures can be obtained to make the amendment effective in 1952 is uncertain, but we are not concerned with a single election. Our vote now in the House should be based on the wider considerations which I have stated as being my own reasons for urging its adoption. Each of us must weigh the measure to determine whether or not it is more democratic in fact and in theory than our present method, and whether it will strengthen our two-party political system. If we conclude that these desirable ends will be furthered—and I do not see how any other conclusion can be reached—then it follows without doubt that we will have greatly improved our process of choosing a President. In the long run such a contribution to our institutions of Government must inevitably benefit not only the individual voter, but also the parties themselves, and the entire Government. The American Presidency is of such fundamental importance that to strengthen and improve it can only produce beneficial results of a widespread character.

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McSWEENEY].

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I feel that I truthfully can say that my voting record of the five terms which I have served in the Congress of the United States would show that I have not been sectional in my attitude toward national problems. However, I must oppose the Lodge-Gossett bill which proposes an amendment to the Federal Constitution which would change the method by which the President of the United States is to be elected.

I do so for a few—to me—basic reasons. In the first place I am for a direct election of the President. I want every voting citizen to have his or her vote properly recorded directly for the person whom each citizen may choose. This would abolish the electoral college which was set up in our Constitution by that wise, patient, patriotic, and forward-looking group of men who drafted our Constitution. However, the Lodge-Gossett bill does not really abolish the electoral college, we still stand in the shadow of it. We still have the ghost of it. In other words this bill provides for each person to be able to vote for the President but his State vote is still reported on a proportional basis.

Here is where I temporarily become sectional. I want to protect the basic interest of my own State of Ohio. We of Ohio have been generous. We have helped with national highway programs; we support reclamation programs for other States, and a really unfair share of the burden of such programs fall upon a State like Ohio which pays a tremendous tax through its corporations and personal incomes, but we should not be asked to give up our rights on a basis of population. May I illustrate.

Let us take the election of 1948. If the Lodge-Gossett plan were in operation during that election Ohio would have just a fraction of one electoral vote.

Let us assume that President Truman had carried Ohio by 10,000 votes, and that the total vote had been 3,000,000. These figures minimize rather than exaggerate the actual situation. The result can be shown by the following equation: 3,000,000—the total vote—is to 10,000, the President's majority, as 25—the number of Ohio's electoral college—is to x; 3,000,000x will equal 250,000, thus x will equal one-twelfth. So Ohio would in reality have one-twelfth of 1 electoral vote. Since the vote cannot be divided it would mean that Ohio had 1 electoral vote. In the 1948 election it figures the same for New York State, Illinois, California, and other large States. I can pick five large States whose total electoral vote would have been 6, while Mississippi alone would have 9 votes. Is this representative democracy?

Our Constitution provides the finest balance of power among its component geographical divisions which we call States of any other confederation or federation which has ever existed. We give to our States proportional representation on the basis of population in our lower house of our bicameral legislature, and equal representation, or two senators each, in the upper house or senate. What could be more fair. The Lodge-Gossett proposal would upset this time-honored balance.

No matter as important as a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution should be considered lightly. It is too serious. However, for this very important matter only 40 minutes was permitted for discussion. I hope that the people of our Sixteenth District and of the State of Ohio generally will feel as I do on this important matter and will approve my voting against it.

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, let me say in conclusion, in submitting this to the States it takes the votes of three-fourths of them before it can become a part of the Constitution. We simply give them the right to pass on this matter. I wish I had time to refer to the many eminent persons who have written in support of this resolution. The House should follow the example of the Senate and vote to submit this fundamentally important reform to the States.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FULTON. Under a motion to suspend the rules it is not possible to amend the resolution in any way, is it?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

The question is, Will the House suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GOSSETT) there were—ayes 79, noes 141.

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 134, nays 210, not voting 86, as follows:

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE ACT

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 2591) to amend the Public Health Service Act to support research and training in arthritis and rheumatism, multiple sclerosis, cerebral palsy, epilepsy and blindness, and other diseases, and for other purposes, with House amendments thereto, insist on the amendments of the House and ask for a conference with the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. PRIEST, BIEMILLER, WILSON of Oklahoma, WOLVERTON, and HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.

COPPER IMPORT-TAX SUSPENSION

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution (H. J. Res. 502) to suspend certain import taxes on copper.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the import tax imposed under section 3425 of the Internal Revenue Code shall not apply with respect to articles (other than copper sulfate and other than composition metal provided for in paragraph 1657 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, which is suitable both in its composition and shape, without further refining or alloying, for processing into castings, not including as castings ingots or similar cast forms) entered for consumption or withdrawn from warehouse for consumption during the period beginning July 1, 1950, and ending with the close of June 30, 1951.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, House Joint Resolution 502 would extend for another year, or until June 30, 1951, the import tax on copper. The import tax of 4 cents per pound on copper was passed in 1932, and then under a reciprocal trade agreement was reduced 50 percent, to 2 cents per pound. Our committee held two full days of hearings on this bill.

We heard representatives of five departments of Government: The Department of Defense, the Department of State, the Treasury Department, the Department of the Interior, and the Department of Commerce. They all recommended the extension of this exemption of the import tax on copper for 2 years, but this bill provides for an extension of only 1 year, from June 30 of this year until June 30, 1951.

The testimony before our committee, in my opinion, proved conclusively not only the importance, but the necessity, for the extension of the suspension of this tax for another year. According to the testimony, which I believe was not disputed, the domestic supply of copper is only about 74 percent of the domestic demand.

The Committee on Ways and Means heard, as I said, not only the heads of these Departments, but we heard the domestic producers, we heard Members of Congress, and those engaged or interested in the industrial use of copper. The testimony, I repeat, indicated clearly that the domestic supply is not equal to the domestic demand, and even with what imports are coming in now, still the supply is hardly equal to or adequate to meet the demand. There is nothing in the evidence to indicate that the price of copper would be seriously affected or that the supply would exceed the demand, if the suspension of the import tax is continued. The testimony showed that the price of copper has gone up during the time this import tax has been suspended, until it is now, with one exception, the highest it has ever been. The price has increased from 16 cents a pound in 1949 to the present price of 22½ cents per pound. This shows that the price of copper has not been seriously or adversely affected by the suspension of this import tax.

I know of no reason why, and, in fact, no reason was assigned which satisfied our committee, this extension should not be granted. The domestic supply for the present year is estimated to be 300,000 tons short of the domestic demand. You can all readily understand that, owing to the foreign situation, with which you are all familiar, the demand for copper is going to increase rather than decrease. Not only will there be a demand by the commercial consumers of copper, which is constantly on the increase, but the Government itself will be in the market for increased amounts of copper to meet the foreign situation.

Nevertheless, our committee wanted to go slow on the matter. We did not want to extend this act for 2 years, as was first proposed, and in order to be careful and not do anything seriously to affect or lower the price of the domestic copper or interfere with full production of domestic copper, in which we are all interested, we agreed that it should be extended only 1 year. Copper mining is now at a high level of production. The price is high. When the price of any commodity is high, that of course stimulates production. If the price is low, it has the effect of decreasing production.

Taking everything into consideration, as our committee did, we felt that the extension of the suspension of this tax for 1 year, or until June 30, 1951, is essential, if the domestic consumers are to have an adequate supply. Of course, the Government needs must be supplied. At the same time, we feel certain there is nothing in the situation to cause any alarm or uneasiness on the part of domestic consumers as to the price of copper, because the supply is so much less than the demand for copper. It is reasonable to assume that the price will not be seriously affected by a reduction in demand in the near future.

We must remember that the import tax on copper was suspended in the Eightieth Congress on account of the supply not filling the demand, and this suspension was continued during the first session of this Congress until June 30, 1950. There is greater reason now why this suspension should be extended another year than there was either when Congress suspended it in the Eightieth Congress, or continued the suspension in the first session of the Eighty-first Congress.

For these reasons among others, Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will vote overwhelmingly to approve this House joint resolution.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, this is quite a serious issue in the matter of our national defense. I am opposed to the suspension of these import taxes because of the adverse effect it will have on the health of our mining industry in this country. I cannot subscribe to the argument just made that the price of copper has recently increased from 16 cents to 22½ cents, and that that should take care of the situation, when from April 1, 1949, to July 1, 1949, the price of copper was pushed down from 23½ cents to 16 cents and then back up again during the past 13 months. Therefore, it has not been a matter of the lifting up of the price of copper from 16 cents, but it was a temporary and manipulated depression in the price.

It is my contention that the suspension of this excise tax will have a devastating effect on the production of copper by those mines that are marginal mines which cannot produce copper advantageously on a depressed market and in competition with foreign imports.

My only hope is that I can be of some help in building a healthy, vigorous domestic mining industry because no proponent of this suspension has yet been able to assure me that any part of the larger imports will be stockpiled by industry for use in an emergency. The present price of copper, the present situation, the demand for finished industrial products is such that it is little wonder that the industrial reserves of copper in this country at the present time is at the lowest level that it has ever been since 1944. That is a terrible thing to contemplate. That is the effect of this suspension, which has been in operation during the last 2 or 3 years, and with the wave of hysteria and war buying which is now going on, a further depression of our copper reserves will be even more devastating. There is not one proponent of this suspension of the copper tariff who can assure you that one pound of copper can be delivered to us from foreign mines after the shooting starts in any future war.

I say, if you have got your mind on national defense at all, you will do one of two things: Either build up an adequate stockpile industrially, or provide for a healthy local mine production of copper, because you cannot promise us that you can import foreign copper in wartime, not against the snorkle submarine. That is my position on this matter, and I am very much opposed to the suspension of the copper tariff.

The proponents of this legislation are of three general classes.

One class is made up of industrialists who need copper for their industrial production. Obviously they want cheap raw materials for their factories.

A second class is made up of large domestic producers of copper who have foreign mines also. These mine interests want the tariff removed on their foreign production in order to help them as much as possible in their competition with other domestic producers.

The third class of proponents of this legislation is the State Department of our National Government. Their interest is the promotion of maximum foreign trade, and they obviously look to free trade as a means to build up the volume of our foreign trade. They have evidenced no concern over the effect of their free trade policy on our domestic production of strategic and critical materials.

Just after the end of World War II our American industrialists who use copper and our American mining interests who have foreign copper mines, appealed to Congress for help in the rehabilitation of our peacetime economy and they asked specifically for a temporary suspension of the tariff on copper to help them attain that end. Congress enacted legislation to suspend the copper tariff temporarily in the hope that such suspension might be helpful in increasing our supplies of copper to meet our peacetime demands. The demands for peacetime production have exceeded the supplies of copper available. Consequently, notwithstanding the suspension of the tariff on copper the past 3 years, our stocks of refined copper have shrunk to the smallest supply held since October 1944. At the end of June of this year the stock of refined copper held by domestic producers was only 50,327 tons and was equal to only a little more than a week's supply based on the tonnages of metal shipped during June. Stocks of copper held by foreign producers totaled 136,483 tons at the end of June. Total domestic production was 96,334 tons in June, and total foreign copper production during June was 107,920 tons. Obviously the suspension of the copper tariff during the past 3 years has not enabled industry to create industrial stockpiles of copper to meet any war emergency. I submit that the industrial users of copper and the American owners of foreign copper mines requested the suspension of the tariff on copper mainly for the acceleration of peacetime industrial production and not as an insurance of our wartime self-sufficiency. The reduction of our stocks of refined copper indicates that the price of copper products in the peacetime economy and the margin of profit on that trade have been prime incentives to the owners of foreign copper mines and the industrial users of copper. If preparedness for war had been one of their prime objectives they would have made some effort to avoid reducing their copper reserves to the low level at which those reserves stand today.

It is a strange turn indeed that the proponents of this legislation now come before Congress to urge the continued suspension of the copper tariff in order to secure a larger supply of copper from foreign sources as a national defense measure when the total stocks of available copper have been and will continue to be swallowed up in the production of peacetime products even to the extent of diminishing our reserve stocks of copper. So long as the stocks of copper on hand domestically and in foreign lands remain at present levels and the demand for peacetime products stays at present levels or moves higher with the wave of hysterical buying that has already manifested itself, I predict that not 1 ounce of increased imports of foreign copper will be used for national defense unless the Federal Government steps in with rules and regulations channeling such materials to national defense industry. I predict further that the present low level of copper reserves in this country will not under present conditions be increased to meet our defense needs without specific direction by our Federal Government.

Even during this period of frenzied anticipation of possible war and while our sea lanes are still open, I am not impressed very strongly by the tactics of our industrial users of copper and the American owners and producers of foreign copper when the suspension of this tariff is requested as a national defense measure. Furthermore, most certainly no American industrialist or owner of foreign copper mines has been able to assure me that an adequate supply of foreign produced copper can be shipped into our ports after any shooting war with a major power should get under way.

My own great interest is in building the self-sufficiency of this Nation to withstand the impact of war with a major power. I have guarded and protected with all the ability at my command the productive capacity of our American mines. I have also taken long and active interest in the building by our Federal Government of adequate stockpiles of strategic and critical materials. There is a practical limit to the size of our stockpiles and at the time of writing Public Law 520 of the Seventy-ninth Congress we set in motion a 5-year program to attain stockpiles of the size deemed advisable. In the past 4 years the stockpile on hand has grown to only 38.4 percent as of June 30, 1950. That fact together with the low ebb of our industrial stockpiles of copper emphasizes our need to rely upon a healthy and vigorous mining industry within our own borders if we are to approach self-sufficiency for our Nation's defense in war. Even though we had 100 percent of our stockpile reserves, I would still place great emphasis on our own domestic mine health for adequate national defense, but with a Government's stockpile of 38.4 percent and with our copper industrial stocks at the low level they are today we should do everything within our power to build maximum production of all strategic and critical materials within our own land.

From that point of view the question here in this legislation resolves itself to whether the suspension of the tariff on copper will encourage domestic production of copper or whether it may discourage or even reduce such production. It is my firm opinion that the continued suspension of the tariff on copper cannot possibly encourage American domestic production of copper.

We should defeat this measure and continue the duty of 2 cents per pound on imports of copper. If that encouragement to our own domestic mines is not adequate, I ask for the appropriation of funds to increase our Government stockpiles and for the enactment of legislation to extend governmental help for research, development, and exploration, and even to subsidize the production of critical materials such as copper before it is too late.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LYNCH].

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN], my distinguished colleague on the committee, he has pointed out that there is a deficit of copper production. If there is a deficit of domestic copper production, how can we ever stock-pile it? According to the estimate of the Bureau of Mines, 1,200,000 tons of copper will be consumed in the United States during 1950. The estimated production in the United States is 850,000 tons, or a deficit of 350,000 tons during this year, and without looking forward to any possible military needs that we may require within the next 6 months, and if the situation gets worse our position insofar as copper is concerned will also be worse.

There is only one consideration that we should have at this time, and that is whether or not we have sufficient copper in this country to take care of our domestic situation as is, and the possible war situation that may arise. I believe it to have been the opinion of the Ways and Means Committee that they would not, under ordinary circumstances, have extended this bill. As you have been told, the original bill called for an extension of 2 years. We thought that an extension of 1 year at this time would give us a better chance to take a look at the whole situation, so that if the Korean situation became worse we would not put ourselves in the position of cutting down the supply of copper.

Let me point out that this will not bring down the supply of domestic copper.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYNCH. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. The testimony before the Ways and Means Committee was undisputed, I think, that suspending the tariff would not bring any more copper into this country.

Mr. LYNCH. I think it is fair to say that we did not have any testimony before our committee to indicate that the suspension of the tariff would bring more copper into the country. But the important thing is that, under the present situation with which we are confronted, domestic copper has risen in price 25 percent—from 16 cents to 22½ cents, which is the second highest price for copper on record in recent years. When that increase came about we had a suspension of the tax. Under those circumstances, I cannot see where the suspension of the tax has in any wise curtailed domestic production.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYNCH. I yield.

Mr. PATTERSON. In answer to the gentleman's question, the reimposition of this tax on copper will act as a deterrent in providing an adequate supply to meet our domestic demand.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. That is the gentleman's conclusion, but there was no evidence presented before the Ways and Means Committee—and I listened to all of those hearings—to show that the imports in copper would be affected one iota by the lifting of this tax.

Mr. LYNCH. It would seem to me if the position taken by the gentleman from Iowa is correct that the continuance of this tax would cause a decrease in production. I think that has been clearly refuted by the testimony before the Ways and Means Committee, for the reason that the price has risen for domestic production in 1949 and 1950 by 25 percent. That in itself, according to the testimony, was sufficient to keep the marginal mines in operation. The price reached 22½ cents when we had the suspension of the tax. That being so, it seems to me under those circumstances quite clear that if we continue the exemption of the tax it will not bring about adverse conditions to the copper industry.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYNCH. I yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I will ask the gentleman what the price was on April 1, 1949.

Mr. LYNCH. I do not know. I know that from the gentleman's experience he would probably be able to tell me.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. It was about 23½ cents, and it was depressed from that to 16 cents in the period of about 2 months' time. So let us start from April 1, 1949, and try to do better.

Mr. LYNCH. I am not starting from April 1, 1949; I am starting from the time when it started to rise while we had this exemption. Why do you go back to April 1949 when what we are concerned with now is what is happening during the last year, that since June 1949 the price has gone up 25 percent?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYNCH. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Is it not odd that this committee and this Congress is so anxious to allow the importation of copper and at the very same time refuses to do anything to help the high-cost domestic producer of copper and other metals?

Mr. LYNCH. Let me say that our committee has handled every bit of the copper legislation that has come before it. We feel that by doing this we are certainly aiding the industry in our country. We believe that this is not the time under any circumstance for Congress to take action that will bring about a possible deficit, because we know that under the estimates of the Bureau of Mines that we can expect only 850,000 tons during 1950, and the lowest conservative estimate of need is 1,200,000 tons.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYNCH. I yield.

Mr. PATTERSON. I think the gentleman should show at this point that the amount of copper imported is insufficient for stockpiling and meeting our domestic demand.

Mr. LYNCH. They say that we are stockpiling at the rate of some 20,000 tons a year. I cannot under any circumstances see how we are going to stockpile with the situation as it is; and I honestly would ask any of the gentlemen who have been interrogating me: Do you or do you not wish our country to have sufficient copper on hand in case of a military necessity? If any gentleman will take the floor and say, "I do not care about the military; I do not care whether our troops have what is necessary in the line of copper; I do not care anything about anything else except that these mine owners out West are going to try to keep this tax exemption on for their own selfish interests; I am absolutely opposed to this bill"——

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYNCH. Will the gentleman say that he is in favor of the reimposition of the tax even if it is shown that we have not got enough copper for military needs?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I will be glad to answer that. The gentleman knows I want all the copper we can get and I want it held for military needs. But you are not doing that in the industrial field today. Your reserves are lower today than they have been since 1944 and at the same time your domestic mine production last year was reduced down to 741,000 tons. I hope I have answered your question.

Mr. LYNCH. The gentleman from Iowa is the strongest advocate for stockpiling of strategic material. However, the gentleman knows that under the estimate for the first 5 months of this year the average has been, I think, 84,305 short tons per month and it is estimated we will have 850,000 tons this year. Under that situation and with the possible need for military purposes, does the gentleman ask that copper controls be placed upon the industry in the United States?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. In any war emergency the present low reserves of copper and the inadequate domestic production will undoubtedly call for controls. I believe we are in agreement on that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BENNETT].

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the suspension of the import tax on copper last year had a very disastrous effect on a large segment of the copper mining industry. There is no necessity for any further lifting of the tax and it is time we looked to our own sources of supply of this critical metal in order to have it available during any protracted national emergency.

Last year when the import tax on copper was suspended, and the bottom dropped out of the market, the Michigan copper mines were forced to close down for more than 4 months. During that same period nearly 300,000,000 pounds of copper came to the United States from foreign countries.

While a whole community of more than 50,000 people in northern Michigan suffered, with thousands of copper miners unemployed, the Chilean and African miners continued in their employment. Jobs of the copper miners in Chile were secure at a time when our own miners were walking the streets without work. Is it not time that we took action to prevent the recurrence of a similar tragedy?

The testimony before the Ways and Means Committee on this resolution was undisputed that putting the import tax back on copper would not affect the importation of copper into this country one way or the other. That is a very significant fact.

The people who are advocating this suspension are arguing all around the bush, evading the realities of the situation. The truth is that lifting the tax on copper is not going to bring one more pound of copper from Chile or elsewhere abroad, than we are getting today.

Here is what happened 15 months ago: When the tax was suspended at that time the price of copper was approximately 23½ cents per pound. The proponents of this legislation said then that the demand for copper in this country exceeded the supply; that we could not get along without foreign copper. They said, "Let us take the tax off for another year." We took the tax off. What happened to the price of copper? It immediately declined in a short space of 2 months from 23½ cents to 16 cents per pound.

What did that show? It showed that the copper fabricators who are advocating this legislation did not need all the copper they were talking about, so the demand sloughed off and the price sloughed with it. Exactly that same thing can happen again.

We all realize that we need copper to fight wars, but let us not use this suspension of the tax on copper as a subterfuge. We have a tax on lead. We use that to fight wars. We have a tax on zinc. We use that to fight wars. Nobody is talking about taking the tariff off of those minerals, or many other strategic ores which now have protection.

If we get into an all-out war where are you going to get the copper? Are you going to get it from Chile or Africa or are we going to get it from the mines in the western part of the United States and from the copper mines in the State of Michigan? You know what the answer is. The Government will take over domestic production and supply. That is what we did in World War II. We are not relying on these imports from Chile or from Africa or elsewhere to fight our wars. The argument that the suspension of the copper tax is necessary in the interest of the national defense is nothing but unadulterated sophistry.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. I am opposed to this legislation because I believe it is against the best interests of our national defense. The healthy condition of the mines of our country is absolutely essential to the defense of this country. This tax is sought to be removed because the people importing copper want to be relieved of the obligation and nothing else. The failure of this legislation will not stop copper from coming into this country.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. That is right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it is said by the State Department that we ought to suspend this tax on copper because of our friendly relation with Chile. I want to disabuse your mind on that. It is undisputed that 96 percent of the copper produced in Chile is owned by two monopoly copper mines in the United States, namely, the Anaconda Copper Co. and the Kennecott Copper Co. So, this suspension of tax has nothing to do with the Government of Chile at all. It simply would require the Anaconda Mining Co. and the Kennecott Mining Co. to pay 2 cents per pound to import the copper which they have produced down in South America with slave labor. This tax is necessary to equalize the differential in wages that are paid to the American miners and the wages that are paid in those slave-wage labor camps in Chile.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman hit the nail on the head when he said that if you take the tariff off of goods coming into this country that you take jobs away from the American workingman.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Just this other one thing, Mr. Speaker, I will tell you what is the matter with the people that are advocating the further suspension of this tax. We have an import tax on lead, but we are getting all the lead we need. We have an import tax on zinc, but we are getting all the zinc we need, and we can leave this import tax on copper and we will get all the foreign copper we are getting now. If we put a provision in this bill to suspend the tax on lead and zinc and watches and textiles and shoes and on hats, et cetera, I will say to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. PATTERSON], I do not think he or many other Members would support this bill, and the reason they would not support it is because they would say that the wages paid by the foreign producers of those commodities did not justify the free importation of their products. There is no basis for protecting other commodities and singling out copper for free trade. It is an outrageous discrimination.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. PATTERSON. Is the gentleman advocating that the consumer is to absorb these taxes?

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. The consumer usually absorbs taxes placed on a manufacturer in the price he pays for the product. But the copper fabricator could very well absorb this tax.

Mr. PATTERSON. And we also certainly must import this very vital metal at this time, during this tremendous crisis.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. The gentleman knows that this legislation will not increase copper imports from foreign countries. The tax would probably increase the price of copper by 2 cents a pound and thus protect the American copper miner from unfair competition from abroad. The increased price in the cost of products manufactured with copper will be small indeed compared to the benefits to be derived by thousands of American workingmen. For example: It takes about 80 pounds of copper in the manufacture of an automobile. At 2 cent per pound that might cost the purchaser of an automobile the tremendous sum of $1.60.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as she may require to the gentlewoman from Connecticut [Mrs. WOODHOUSE].

Mrs. WOODHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, I should like to express my strong support for continuing the duty-free importation of copper into the United States for the next year.

There is at the present time a world shortage of copper. I am advised that our domestic production is able to meet only about two-thirds of the domestic demand. The price of copper has risen from 18½ cents per pound in April of this year to 22½ cents per pound in June. Restoration of the duty would bring an additional 2 cents per pound increase. The critical international situation demands that we stockpile as rapidly as possible every strategic material. Accordingly, it seems particularly unwise to allow a 10 percent increase in the price of so important a material as copper.

The United States, perhaps as never before, is vitally concerned in the economic welfare and stability of the countries of the Western Hemisphere. The principal exporters of copper to the United States are Chile, Peru, Mexico, and Canada. Chile is particularly dependent on the sale of copper to this country and on taxes paid by American interests there. She is already hard pressed by a dollar shortage. Restoration of the copper duty would add an estimated $5,000,000 burden.

Manufacturers throughout the State of Connecticut are vitally concerned with this problem. Producers of sheet metal, wire rods, tubes, rolls, pipes, brass, bronze, cable, electrical products and appliances, engineering, heating and refrigeration equipment, hardware, and buttons are all substantial buyers of refined copper or copper products for use in the manufacture of their finished articles.

In my own district, the textile-finishing companies are large buyers of copper in the form of rollers for printing and finishing all types of textiles.

The general economic condition of the entire New England area has been one of serious unemployment in many localities. In Connecticut the industrial pattern is generally that of one industry being the only enterprise in a small community. Any factor which increases the cost of production for these small producers makes imminent the possibility of cut-backs in their labor force. Such an increase in textile manufacture costs particularly would have an extremely serious effect, since unemployment has been especially acute in that industry.

Many industries in Connecticut that are large buyers of copper are also immediately faced with the correspondingly serious problem of proposed tariff reductions on imported goods that compete with their products. Any further increase in their production costs would have a doubly deleterious effect.

In view of these facts, I strongly urge favorable consideration of the continuation of existing laws which allow the importation of copper, duty-free, into the United States.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. BARING].

Mr. BARING. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in accord with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BENNETT]. This is bad legislation. We should not pass it. I appeal to you Members here today, and especially to you Members from west of the Mississippi, not to support this measure, for it is the wrong type of legislation. It has been said that six of the Departments, from the Department of the Secretary of State on down, are in favor of this bill. It may be the popular thing to vote with the bureaucrats downtown, but it is not always right. Much United States capital has moved to Chile for the development of the copper mines, because of low wages and other low costs in foreign countries. There is no reason why we should destroy an essential domestic industry, for the purpose of providing greater profits for those who migrate their investment funds. No program of stockpiling can replace a going and healthy domestic mining industry in the event of war, and there is nothing more important to warfare than copper and other strategic metals.

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARING. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. As I understand, the purpose of this legislation is to aid the national defense effort by getting copper into the country. If that is the case, why cannot the Federal Government go out and buy copper now without this authority?

Mr. BARING. The Federal Government will not pay this 2 cents tariff. If the Munitions Board were to purchase copper for stockpiling, to whom would it pay the tax? To the Treasury Department. It would be a matter of taking the money out of one pocket and putting it into the other. The Government is not subject to this 2 cents tariff. Therefore, the argument presented by the opposition is groundless.

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. In other words, without this legislation the Federal Government can go out and buy all the copper they want.

Mr. BARING. They certainly can.

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. Without paying a tax.

Mr. BARING. That is absolutely correct. The opposition has challenged our patriotism on the floor here today. They have insinuated that we are against the war effort, and that we are guilty of selfishness and greed. This is not true. We are merely trying to protect our own mining interests. I am in favor of a stockpiling program but we should be in a position to supply our needs from our own domestic sources. What would we do, in the case of war, if our sea lanes were cut? Then, what good would the foreign copper do us, if it were unobtainable? That, gentlemen, is the point that we are trying to make understood. So far as patriotism is concerned, I will challenge anyone who would dare to accuse me of being unpatriotic. I am a veteran of World War II, having given 3 years of service to my country. My American heritage is a matter of tremendous importance to me, and I am as patriotic as any man on this floor. It is because I am a good American that I want to have an adequate supply of copper on hand, so that our boys will be adequately protected. However, the point that I am trying to bring out is that the reimposition of the tariff on copper will not prevent foreign copper from coming into this country. It will protect our domestic mining industry. The only ones who do want a protective tariff are the big industrialists and fabricators in this country, who buy their copper elsewhere.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARING. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. The gentleman knows that the fabricators who are talking about this suspension of tax by raw copper. They sell the manufactured produce with copper in it. They want a tariff, and they have a tariff on manufactured copper, but they want to take it off the copper that they purchase.

Mr. BARING. The gentleman is correct. I earnestly hope that this legislation is defeated.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may require to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. PATTERSON].

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, the resolution being considered by the House today is a compromise of a measure introduced by me to continue the suspension of the import tax on copper. I am not thoroughly satisfied with the terms of the resolution, feeling that it would be more appropriate for Congress to enact a 2-year suspension as envisioned by H. R. 7151, but I am willing to accept the terms of the resolution as being better than no action at all. I can foresee no material change before 1952 in the present short supply of domestic copper which would justify imposing the 2 cents per pound tax again; and the 1-year limitation in this resolution simply means that the first session of the Eighty-second Congress will again have to expend a goodly amount of time on hearings and debate which could be overcome if H. R. 7151 had been accepted by the committee.

It might be well to trace the history of this legislation so that all Members who are not completely familiar with the background may be informed as to the necessity for the continued suspension of the import tax on copper. An import tax of 4 cents per pound was imposed in 1932 as the domestic supply of copper, at that time, was sufficient to meet the needs of domestic consumption. This remained in effect and in force until our entrance into World War II. Under the war powers granted to the President, Government purchases of foreign materials were automatically exempt from taxes which had been imposed by Congress. Thus, all during World War II the Government purchased such supplies of foreign copper as were available without payment of any tax. In 1947 it became evident that this Nation had changed from a copper surplus producer to a copper scarcity situation.

The supply of American copper was insufficient to meet the needs of the postwar period. I introduced legislation suspending for 2 years the 4 cents per pound tax. The bill was acted upon and was one of the first major pieces of business of the Eightieth Congress. In the interim, negotiations were undertaken under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act whereby the import tax was lowered the maximum amount of 50 percent—making the tax 2 cents per pound. With the expiration of the 1947 act I introduced again legislation extending this suspension in 1949. A compromise measure was reported out, extending for only 1 year the tax suspension and this became Public Law 33. The expiration date was June 30 of this year. I again introduced legislation suspending the tax for a further 2-year period. The resolution before us now is a result of the House Ways and Means Committee's authorization to its chairman to introduce a 1-year suspension measure.

The reasons for favorable action by the Congress are manifold and deserving. It must be noted that basically the copper mines of the United States cannot produce sufficient tonnage to care for peacetime consumption. This is entirely without regard to the stockpiling program of this country, and without regard to any further military needs which may have been thrust upon us in the past few weeks. Domestic production from 1947 to the end of May 1950 has averaged in the neighborhood of 80,000 tons monthly, while the need is demonstrated to have been approximately 105,000 tons during this same period—making a deficit of 25,000 tons per month. With stepped-up production since May the deficit is even greater. Stockpile figures are not a matter of public record, but it is safe to presume that the needs will average 20,000 tons per month for this purpose alone.

It can be seen, therefore, that there is no justification for excluding from our markets the copper which can be made available from other sources.

Perhaps the greatest beneficiary of our imports is the nation of Chile. It will be remembered that Chile was a stalwart ally during World War II, and the Chilean Government has, since that time, alined itself very closely with the policies of America in the war against Communist expansion.

Domestic production, at the present time, approximates very closely its peak at any time during World War II, when drastic measures were taken to assure that every ounce of this most necessary metal was made available for our war needs. Any argument to the effect that continued suspension of the tax penalizes the American miner is therefore without merit. Employment in our domestic mines continues at a high level and profits to the owners have been substantial—even with the tax suspension in force.

Perhaps the greatest beneficiary of the tax suspension has been the individual citizen. Many times he is lost sight of in the struggle between one group and another in the pros and cons of legislative debate. If the tax is to be levied on copper imports it simply means that the higher price will be paid by the consumer for the goods he buys in our retail outlets. Copper is a basic material in practically everything we use in our daily life. The industries which produce automobiles, refrigerators, electrical appliances, houses, home furnishings, and many other such necessary goods would all have to impose an additional burden upon the consumer by raising prices which are already, in many cases, beyond the purse of the individual. The onerous burden of price increases would overbalance the small amount which would be gained by the Treasury by continuance of the tax.

The unprovoked attack on South Korea and the subsequent action of this country in supplying men and materials to prevent Communist domination of the Far East indicates that on this basis alone cutting off imports of copper cannot be justified. We all realize the gravity of the Korean situation and can understand the anxiety of our defense planners in making certain that a sufficient supply of copper is readily available for our needs. Stockpiling must be increased rather than held at a minimum, and even greater supplies of foreign copper will be necessary to carry out this program. Practically every instrument of war contains copper or copper alloy, and full production must be maintained if we are to keep faith with those who are so valiantly struggling against tremendous odds to stem the rush of communism in the Far East.

It is essential that the House act with dispatch in adopting this legislation so that the normal trade in copper, which has been disrupted since the end of June, may be resumed without further delay.

I ask that every Member of this body, in considering the legislation before us, think only in terms of the national interest rather than regional interest.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I am opposed to House Joint Resolution 502. This bill would suspend for a period of 1 year from June 30, 1950, the tariff on imports of copper.

I recognize the serious shortage of copper at the present time. Testimony before the committee indicated clearly that the sum total of our domestic production and our imports will do no more than approximate the amount of copper necessary for current industrial consumption. At the current rate of consumption this will not permit stockpiling for wartime needs. I therefore approach this bill from the angle of determining whether it will tend to increase the total available new copper for our industrial, national defense, and stockpiling neds. Testimony was definite before the committee that further suspension of tariff would not mean an increase in the importation of copper.

Copper imports would continue about the same as at present. Accepting this fact then, there is no possible way of increasing our aggregate source of copper other than to increase our domestic production.

The real question then is whether continuance of the present tax of 2 cents per pound will tend to increase the present domestic copper production.

On this there can be no substantial question. Domestic production of copper is closely associated with the price of copper in the market. To the extent the duty will help keep the domestic price at or near the present level of 23 cents per pound, domestic production will increase. Marginal mines, those that can only be operated when the price is in excess of 20 cents per pound, will reopen and all domestic producers will expand their operations as the management realizes that the Government is determined to protect this major source of copper. I believe that domestic production can and will be increased if the industry is given this protection. I am sure that it is the only possible way we can get more copper, for the importers state definitely that imports will not be increased. Domestic production is a flexible factor with regard to copper and we should give every encouragement to the domestic producers.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Can the gentleman tell the House, in view of the question of military necessity which has been raised, how much of the imported copper is going into the national-defense stockpile?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I cannot, other than to say that the testimony indicated very little, if any.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. If we permit this copper to come in without a duty, do the manufacturers of this country who want to manufacture products in which copper is used want the manufactured articles to come in without a duty?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. No, they want protection.

Mr. RICH. Certainly they do.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. PATTERSON. Does not the gentleman realize that if we do not have an edequate supply of copper to meet the domestic demand up in the State of Connecticut and all New England we are going to have a tremendous amount of unemployment, and in case of a real national emergency we are going to be stuck?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. It is the over-all picture we must consider. If there is insufficient copper for national defense needs, copper will properly be taken for these needs and private industry will have what is left. The solution is to increase the sum total of domestic production and imports to meet all needs, industrial and defense.

A study of the subject discloses the imports of copper are substantially the same regardless of the price of copper in the market. Thus when copper was sold for 16 cents per pound in the American market, imports were about the same as now with the price at 23 cents per pound.

On the other hand, domestic production took all the loss in production when the price dropped to 16 cents per pound.

As the price increases, new American sources expand. It is this flexible factor we should encourage and which will be encouraged by the retention of the 2 cents per pound tax. In the interests of our national economy and our national defense, I hope this bill will be defeated.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I appeared with other Western Congressmen before the Committee on Ways and Means on July 10 and 11 giving the best opposition we knew how to offer to this legislation. I do want to express my deep appreciation to Chairman DOUGHTON and the whole committee for the kindly consideration afforded the opposition.

But before I begin what I had in mind to say, I want to nail one fallacy which I have heard expressed here today. It has been said in favor of this legislation that this is in the interest of national defense. That is a fallacy. We did not have this legislation suspending the excise duty during all the years of the Second World War and the foreign copper the Government got did not cost more because of the tax. Did we get copper during the Second World War? We did. We supplemented home wartime production with foreign copper without incurring the extra burden of an excise tax then on the statute books. We should retain this tax on foreign copper for industrial use while bringing in without that extra cost necessary foreign copper for stockpiling purposes and for military needs.

During the recent war we were not able to produce all needed copper within our own country, but it came in and the Government of the United States did not pay any 2 cents or 4 cents per pound on that copper. As several of my colleagues pointed out here, we can get this copper now as we did then, from Chile or from any place else and stockpile it or use it for military purposes, without paying the additional 2 cents. I am in favor of doing that.

For 14 years I have struggled on the floor of the House and in my committee to see that we wisely and energetically stockpile strategic and critical material such as copper. That is why I love my friend from Iowa, because he has led that fight, too. The wise policy is to stockpile what we must from abroad and concurrently produce what we can at home.

We must see to it that we keep an active mining industry functioning in this country. Anything that tends to hurt that mining industry, as the suspension of this excise duty will certainly do, is bad for the country. I am like Patrick Henry. I have no light to guide my feet, except the light of the lamp of experience. Our experience of 18 months ago warns against it. Eighteen months ago you did suspend the duty. What happened? Exactly what the gentleman from Michigan said. Two months after it was suspended the price of copper dropped from 23½ cents down to 16 cents. What assurance have we or have you that it will not happen again right now?

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Last summer when many of our mines closed down because the price of copper went from 23 cents down to 16 cents a pound, what happened in Chile? Every Chilean miner was working. Every Chilean miner employed by the American capitalists that own the mines down there were working while 50,000 people in my community up in Michigan were distressed with about 5,000 men out of work while the Chilean miners were working. That is exactly what the proponents of this legislation are asking the Congress to do at this moment.

Mr. MURDOCK. Exactly so. Mines all over the West closed down and those that did not close down curtailed their operations to 5 days a week and some to 3 days a week. That is what I fear you are looking forward to by the passage of this proposed legislation.

The mass of my people regard this tax as vital for about one-third of Arizona's economy is built on the copper-mining industry, and I remember only too well a period after World War I when those mines were closed. I do not want to see another such period for domestic copper mining in our country, for such a situation is detrimental not only to the States involved, and to their people, but also to the best interests of national defense itself.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may require to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. D'EWART]

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for House Joint Resolution 502 to suspend certain import taxes on copper for 1 year. Ordinarily I would oppose this resolution as not being in the best interest of my State or our country. However, these are not ordinary times. An editorial in today's Washington Daily News begins with these words:

Prepare. America stands today in deadly danger.

Three weeks of the crisis that took violent form in Korea have made our country's peril starkly plain.

The committee report on House Joint Resolution 502 states:

Your committee held two full days of hearings on the subject of suspension of the import tax on copper in order to afford representatives of the Government departments, domestic producers of copper, and industrial consumers of copper, as well as other interested parties, an opportunity to present their views.

According to statistics supplied by the Department of Commerce on copper supply and domestic consumption, domestic production of copper is now only 74 percent of domestic consumption. For the first 5 months of 1950, domestic copper production on a smelter basis averaged 84,705 short tons per month, while imports of copper averaged 49,876 short tons per month. For the same period, the domestic production of primary copper, according to the Bureau of Mines, has averaged less than 75,000 tons a month. If that rate is continued for the remainder of 1950, the annual reduction of refined copper will be about 850,000 tons. For the same period, the Bureau of Mines estimates that the total requirement of primary refined copper for commercial purposes only will be at least 1,200,000 tons, indicating a deficit of supply of at least 300,000 tons to be filled from imports. Moreover, the Munitions Board advised that steps have recently been taken to accelerate the procurement program for stockpile to the greatest extent possible consistent with available supplies and funds. This action tends to increase the market pressure, and creates a situation which minimizes the possibility of any surplus copper becoming available for the rebuilding of industry stocks for some time to come.

Since June 1949 the United States price of copper, then 16 cents, has progressively increased until it is now 22⅛ cents, within 1 cent of the postwar peak of August 1948 when copper reached 23½ cents per pound.

Review of the testimony of witnesses at the committee hearings indicates that the available supply of copper is currently, and for the near future is likely to be, less than demand. Taking into account the present price of copper, it appears that suspension of the import tax on copper until the close of June 30, 1951, would not impair domestic production of copper, which is now close to the highest level in history (except the 1940-44 period). In view of the foregoing considerations and of the probable heavy volume of domestic civilian and military requirements of copper over the next several months, it is the opinion of the committee that the suspension of the import tax on copper should be continued at least through June 30, 1951.

Under these conditions I am compelled to vote for the resolution. If these were in any way normal times I would vote against this resolution. In view of the war situation and our country's need for copper which cannot possibly be supplied by our domestic mines, I shall vote for this 1-year extension of the suspension of certain import taxes on copper.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may require to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. GRANGER].

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the suspension of the tariff on copper, as proposed by this bill. I never voted for it when it was suspended the last time. I think it is a bad bill. I think it is unfortunate that they should drag the war emergency into this, when 2 months ago, before they ever knew of the Korean situation, they intended to try to reduce the tariff even in peacetime.

If we need any copper for any war purpose, the Government can obtain all it needs without this bill and do so without paying any tariff whatsoever.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, due to either inadvertence or design, both equally culpable, an import tax of 2 cents a pound or $40 a ton on copper went into effect July 1. This is not only contrary to the interests of the consumers of copper products and the thousands engaged in their manufacture in this country but, even more important, is injurious to our national security and well-being.

Once again, we are forced by pressure from an organized bloc of special interests—this time the Mountain States copper interests who want to advance the price on their product another 2 cents per pound. This 2 cents increase will have to be paid by our citizens twice, once as consumers when they buy finished products made of copper, and again as taxpayers when the Government is forced to buy this higher-priced copper for the Nation's stockpile of strategic materials.

The United States consumes over a million tons of copper a year, which is 300,000 tons more than we produce domestically. This extra cost of $12,000,000 will, of course, be passed on to the consumers, in addition to the higher cost of domestic copper, making a total of over $40,000,000 increased cost of copper each year to the users. Already the speculators are having a heyday. As the power of the Mountain States contingent became evident this spring, the price of copper began to rise, adding even more to the hardships of homebuilders and other innocent bystanders.

The increased cost of copper ore will undoubtedly hit hard those industries which manufacture copper products in competition with other metalwares. This, in turn, will cause unemployment all over the country. It will be acutely felt, I am told, in my congressional district where a large number of plants are located which fabricate products consuming large quantities of copper.

There is no possible excuse for reimposition of this import duty which was originally designed to rescue our copper industry during the depths of the depression when copper was a drug on the market and miners were unable to obtain work. Now, the situation is entirely different. Domestic mines are unable to meet our requirements, and the industry is operating at top production. There is no immediate prospect for any diminution in this peak demand. Indeed, both industry and Government need all the copper they can get, and more.

Furthermore, this short-sighted attitude is endangering our relations with copper-producing countries, particularly Chile, whose entire economy is so definitely geared to copper and which vitally needs American dollars for internal stability. Nothing could be more foolish than to impose this import duty at the present time when we need all the friends we can muster and when the welfare of our domestic copper industry is in no way in jeopardy.

There undoubtedly are situations where a tariff is needed on goods entering this country in order to protect domestic industries and prevent unemployment among our own people. But certainly there can be no excuse for imposing these tariffs simply for the purpose of enhancing the profits of a few mining companies which are able now to sell their entire output at prices to yield handsome returns.

This bill to continue for 1 year the duty-free status of copper ore should be passed at once as a matter of the highest urgency, both industrial and strategic.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remaining time, one-half minute, to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I simply hold up a paper for you to view. We are in war. I have been a protectionist all my life, but when I see what is happening to our boys in Korea, and know that we must have copper to go into every shell, and when I know that we are 300,000 tons short, an amount that cannot be produced by our mines, the time has come for us to be realistic and measure that against the lives of our men.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I think the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] probably the best known protectionist in the House, has in his tersely cogent remarks emphasized the necessity of the bill's immediate passage. National defense demands it. Our boys are dying in Korea as they fight against terrific odds and no one can prophesy their needs a week or month from now. I led the House fight last year against yielding to the other body's cut of $375,000,000 from stockpiling funds and I am glad that the final compromise involved only a loss of $100,000,000. It was a great mistake and, as I insisted at that time, we cannot afford to gamble with American security now. The stockpiling of this metal is being accelerated. Industrial consumers are upping their requirements and the Bureau of Mines sees a large deficit of supply unless we act promptly.

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Speaker, House Joint Resolution 502, from the Committee on Ways and Means, actually is the proposal of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. PATTERSON] with the exception that extension of the copper import-tax suspension is recommended for only 1 year.

Copper is the most vital of raw materials used in the industries of the State of Connecticut. These industries, if the present Korean conflict or ramifications continue, will once again be called upon to produce the materials and matériel which they provided for the arsenal of democracy. The proposed action to be taken today under suspension of the rules will, I am convinced, tend to provide a continuous supply of copper and may possibly obtain even more copper than is presently available.

Actually, this resolution is an extension of the first proposal made by Mr. PATTERSON in regard to the import of copper which passed the House on March 12, 1947. Earlier on that day the President addressed a joint session of the House and Senate on the menace that threatened Greece, Turkey, and the Middle East—the gravity of the outlined situation pointed up the need to take every action that would increase our supply of copper. Today there is an analogous combination of circumstances as we consider this resolution; impelling reasons why the action we shall take in passing this legislation are patently clear—after the message that will be delivered by the same President to the House on Wednesday with reference to the Korean War, these reasons will be more compelling in the light of its contents and recommendations.

Many industries in Connecticut, large and small; many fabricators throughout the United States cannot keep their workers at their jobs unless copper is available to them. I heartily endorse the legislation, commend the earnest application of the gentleman from the Fifth Connecticut District to get an extension passed by the House and urge the Members to vote, as I will, for its passage.

Mr. PATTEN. Mr. Speaker, It would appear that it should not be necessary for me and my colleagues in the West, and others interested in the mining industry, to find it necessary to again plead with the Congress of the United States concerning the excise tax on copper. However, to protect the citizens of Arizona and others who are affected by this proposal, we find it necessary to make every effort in bringing before the Congress the grave economic condition that will be brought about if further suspension of the excise tax is allowed. We need only to look back some 15 months to see a like condition which was brought about by those who urged and proposed the further suspension of this tax, using as their arguments the inability of the domestic miners to supply the amount the market required and further discoloring the picture by using the argument of diminishing surplus stocks and the great need for foreign material. All of these matters were proposed for the purpose of a further suspension.

It is interesting to note that the proponents of this line of thinking are the fabricators who desire competition among those who sell them low-priced materials and yet at the same time these same fabricators demand and get ample tariff protection on the goods they manufacture. He wishes that there be no protection on what he buys but he insists on their being protection on what he sells. We also have a second group to be considered and that is those mining companies who own large copper mines abroad. They are able to use cheap labor where the standard of living is low and yet they desire unrestrained limit as compared with our domestic producers who have a high-cost production. A high-cost production is imperative if we are to maintain our standard of living as our workers know it today and certainly there is no one in this group that would desire that these standards be lowered, especially in favoring workers in foreign countries so that they may dispose of their produce on our markets. Yet this is exactly what happened some 15 months ago, and I am sure that it will and can happen again.

Fifteen months ago the copper price f. o. b. Connecticut Valley dropped from 23½ cents per pound to 16 cents per pound. This latter price was certainly far out of line with what the domestic producers must have in order to maintain the present standard of living in the western copper camps. A glowing picture has been painted of how we make every effort to keep our standard of living and give to our laboring class a livable wage. Yet, following the last suspension the workers total weekly wage dropped from $72.83 to $58.34 and that included only those who were working full time, since the mines had to curtail by cutting down the number of days the miners were employed during the week, and in addition to this many were on half-time basis and many were unemployed.

It is significant to note that in January 1949, when it was being considered whether or not to further suspend the excise tax on foreign copper, there were 298 unemployment checks totaling $5,774 issued to the unemployed copper miners in Arizona. However, in the month of August of the same year, when foreign copper was coming in freely, many of our mines were forced to curtail, and in some instances shut down, and in that month there were issued 3,055 benefit checks to unemployed copper miners totaling $59,558. This gives you briefly a picture of what is happening to the State of Arizona and the economy of our State when we extend the suspension on the excise tax on foreign copper.

The 1949 slump in copper cost the State of Arizona an estimate of over $2,250,000 in income tax. This figure is minor as to what it cost the employees and the owners of the mines.

At the present time there are some 400 small mines which were closed down due to the slump in April 1949. These same mines were the first to respond to the call issued when metals were needed during World War II. These same mines at this time need the protection and assurance of the Congress that should they go back into operation they will be able to continue such operation by not having further suspension of the excise tax on foreign copper. This group of miners have not received favorable consideration in their request for previous legislation in the Eighty-first Congress. And certainly it is little enough for them to receive the just consideration which they are entitled to through this request. The small mining industry in Arizona has been curtailed to the point that unless action is taken to encourage their continued operation our national security is endangered.

Those supporting the measure to further suspend the tax are disregarding what should be uppermost in their minds, since it directly affects the American people. We saw a great show here in Washington recently when the President of Chile came to our country on a visit and I am sure all of you read and received propaganda to the effect that Chile must maintain its market of export copper to the United States if it is to survive. And the picture painted by its President was indeed a doleful one. Yet, I do not recall of anyone raising his voice for the people of Arizona and the other Western States, and yet the same thing can be said if we do not take action and protect our domestic copper-producing States.

I appeal to you, my colleagues in the Congress, to give serious consideration to this problem and have uppermost in your mind the effect your action will have on the citizens of the copper-producing States. We certainly do not want it said, nor do we want any action on the part of our Congress to indicate, that there are those who are more interested in what will happen to the people in the foreign producing countries as against what will happen to the people of Arizona and other States. It is therefore imperative that no further extension be granted on the suspension of the excise tax on foreign copper and I trust that this group will give favorable consideration to my request.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time, 1 minute, to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, carrying out the statement made by the distinguished minority leader on the Ways and Means Committee, I read as a part of my remarks an editorial appearing in the Cleveland Press and other Scripps-Howard newspapers:

SUSPEND THIS CRAZY TAX ON COPPER IN A HURRY

A tax of $40 a ton on imported copper, suspended at the beginning of World War II, has been back in effect since July 1.

Permitting this tax to remain in effect would be economic lunacy.

Even before the Korean crisis, this country's industries were using far more copper than its domestic mines produced.

Now the need for copper is tremendously increased. Weapons for Americans who are fighting in Korea will take a lot of copper. Our inadequate stockpiles of this and other metals should be built up fast against the menacing possibility of a bigger war.

And the foolish tax endangers relations with our South American neighbors, especially friendly Chile, main source of our copper imports.

The House Ways and Means Committee has approved a bill to suspend that tax for a year. The House should pass this bill in a hurry, and the Senate should follow suit.

So this bill is of the utmost importance, and should be passed.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

All time has expired.

The question is, Will the House suspend the rules and pass the bill?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MILLS) there were—ayes 83, noes 39.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present, and I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The roll call is automatic. The Doorkeeper will close the doors. The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 283, nays 58, not voting 89, as follows:

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days within which to extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

AMENDING THE CLAYTON ACT

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 8763) to amend the Clayton Act with respect to the recovery of triple damages under the antitrust laws, and for other purposes, with a committee amendment.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 4 and 5 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914 (38 Stat. 731; 15 U. S. C. 15), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. (a) Any person heretofore or hereafter injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor in the United States district court for the district in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee.

"(b) Whenever the United States is hereafter injured in its business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws it may sue therefor in the United States district court for the district in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover actual damages by it sustained.

"(c) Any action (including an action brought by or on behalf of the United States) to enforce any cause of action under this section shall be forever barred unless commenced within 6 years after the cause of action accrued.

"SEC. 5. (a) A final judgment or decree hereafter rendered in any civil or criminal proceeding, but not including a suit or proceeding under section 4 (b), brought by or on behalf of the United States under the antitrust laws to the effect that a defendant has violated said laws shall be prima facie evidence against such defendant in any proceeding brought pursuant to subsections 4 (a) and 4 (b) against such defendant under said laws as to all matters respecting which said judgment or decree would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto: Provided, That this section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees entered before any testimony has been taken.

"(b) Whenever any civil or criminal proceeding is instituted by the United States to prevent, restrain, or punish violations of any of the antitrust laws, or to recover damages under section 4 (b) of this act, the running of the statute of limitations in respect of each and every private right of action arising under section 4 (a) and based in whole or in part on any matter complained of in said proceeding shall be suspended during the pendency thereof."

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this act, the term "antitrust laws" has the meaning assigned to it by the first section of the Clayton Act.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

I am not opposed to the bill, but if no one is opposed, I would demand a second.

The SPEAKER. If no one else is opposed, the gentleman qualifies if he desires.

Mr. MICHENER. I demand a second, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CELLER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the second be considered as ordered.

Without objection, the second was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] is recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this bill amends the antitrust laws in two particulars. It seeks to make the Clayton Act current with present realities.

First, it permits the United States Government to bring action for actual damages sustained where there are violations of the antitrust laws, and the United States Government is directly affected and damaged.

Secondly, it provides for a uniform statute of limitations with reference to the bringing of triple damage suits under the Sherman Act by private persons aggrieved by the antitrust law violation—that is, for example, through price fixing, allocation, abuse of patents, and the like.

It is rather anomalous that the courts have held that suits may be brought for damages for violations of the antitrust laws by a city, by a municipality. A suit may be brought by a State government for damages involved in violations of the antitrust laws. Yet the United States Government, by a decision of the Supreme Court, is precluded from bringing such an action.

Well, if we accord such action to a State, if we accord such action to a municipality, it seems woefully in error not to accord the same right to the United States Government, particularly when we keep in mind that the United States Government is the largest purchaser of supplies. For example, the Department of Defense alone purchased, in the 9 months ending March 1950, over $2,500,000,000 worth of supplies. That does not take into account civilian supplies. Therefore, the United States Government, being the largest purchaser, becomes the greatest sufferer from monopolistic exactions.

The American taxpayer is entitled to the full value of his tax dollar, and he should be protected against its going into the pockets of wrongdoers in the form of excessive prices and profits resulting from violations of the antitrust laws.

The report on this bill, which you probably have before you, calls attention to the fact that for the first half year ending March 31, 1937, 18 companies submitted to the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department bids identical to the penny on 82 different sizes of tires and tubes. The same thing happened again during the next half year period with even higher prices; the bids were exactly alike. And when identical bids were again submitted for the third half year period which covered October 1, 1937, to March 31, 1938, the Procurement Division, upon the advice of the Attorney General, rejected the bids and invited new ones, but the new bids were again identical to those rejected. As a result of those identical bids it was discovered that the United States had been injured to the extent of $351,000 but was deprived of the right to bring action against those companies because of the collusion.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 343 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

AMENDING THE CLAYTON ACT

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, in addition to providing the Government of the United States a judicial forum where it can sue for damages for breaches of the antitrust laws, where for example bids are collusive or where markets have been divided and prices have been fixed, this bill also provides for a uniform statute of limitations within which actions for damages must be brought by private litigants.

There is great confusion with reference to the bringing of triple-damage actions on the part of private litigants against those who have offended against the antitrust laws. In some States the statute of limitations has been deemed to be 1 year, which is woefully insufficient a time within which to bring a very difficult triple-damage suit. In other States there is a statute of 2 years. In Georgia, for example, the statute of limitations is 20 years. So that you have States having a period as low as 1 year and another State having a period as high as 20 years.

Sixteen States—Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, North Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Vermont, and Wisconsin—have 6-year statutes.

The bill before you provides for a uniform statute of limitations of 6 years. Indiana has a 15-year statute; Tennessee has 10 years; Wyoming 8 years.

What is the result of that vast number of States over the length and breadth of the land, each having a different period within which a private suit for triple damages must be brought? Confusion results. A litigant and counsel for litigants does not know whether he has a right or whether he has not any right. The Clayton Act presently provides for no specific statute of limitations. The Supreme Court has held that the State law must be applicable. If you have so many different kinds of statutes in the various States, what is your right, if, perchance, a violation occurs in a number of States? If it occurs in a State where the statute is 1 year, and, in addition, occurs in a State where the statute it 10 years, you are given a choice. You very likely would bring action in the State which has the longer statute of limitations. But what of the fellow who is domiciled in a given State where the statute is only 3 or 4 years and the wrong does not cover other States? He is put at a serious disadvantage, and if he waits 3 or 4 years before bringing his action, he is deprived of the benefits of the triple damage provisions of the Sherman Act.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Can the gentleman tell us how long it will be before we vote on the bill?

Mr. CELLER. I hope to secure a vote as quickly as possible.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That was not my point. I am just inquiring because some of the Members were asking.

Mr. CELLER. I should think we would vote momentarily.

So, in order to dispel confusion, we provide for this uniform statute of limitations. Frequently we hear of the uncertainties of the antitrust laws. Well, here is an eminent case where we are endeavoring to remove grave uncertainty as to statutes of limitations in the various States and to give certainty to the number of years that should be involved in a general statute of limitations.

I repeat that there was no vital opposition to this bill. Although numerous organizations were invited to attend, there was practically no vital opposition to it. There is no minority report. The Judiciary Committee voted the bill unanimously, although I believe two Members reserved their right to express themselves concerning one or two of the provisions of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself two additional minutes.

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. What is the limitation which is proposed in this bill?

Mr. CELLER. That the statute of limitations shall be uniform and shall be for a period of 6 years.

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. It applies the same to the Government as to private individuals?

Mr. CELLER. Yes. Section 4, subdivision (c) provides that any action, including one brought by United States, shall be barred unless brought within 6 years.

Private parties are given the right to sue for triple damages. That is by way of an incentive to encourage people to bring such suits, so as to more readily go after the violators of the antitrust laws, but I do not think there is any need for the Government to have any incentive. Hence, the Government is limited to actual damage. If the Government gets its actual damages, I think that should be sufficient. The purpose of the triple damages was by way of an incentive or inducement that need not be present when the Government sues.

At the inception last year of the program of the Monopoly Subcommittee I promised an inquiry that would result in positive legislative action to bring order into the antitrust laws so as to make them more effective instruments in the preservation of free competitive enterprise. The purposeful nature of that program thus far can be judged from the record of the two bills which have been passed by this Congress with little or no opposition. You have passed overwhelmingly a bill to amend the Clayton Act to prevent monopolistic asset mergers, and this bill is now on the Calendar of the Senate after securing the approval of the Senate Judiciary Committee. You have also passed, with no opposition, a bill to increase the antitrust penalties to $50,000, and this is now awaiting action in the Senate Judiciary Committee.

The business community of the country has long been complaining of confusion in the antitrust laws. Confusion certainly exists in determining the particular statute of limitations governing triple-damage actions under the antitrust laws for, unlike virtually all Federal statutes creating rights to sue for torts, the triple-damage section of the Clayton Act is completely silent. Thus the determination is left up to the separate laws of the 48 States.

No one really objects to the idea of having some form of a statute of limitations. The question is as to the extent of the period of limitations. In 1914 the Senate Judiciary Committee reported the Clayton Act with a 6-year statute of limitations, but the provision was lost in the shuffle of compromises.

We have surveyed the State laws to determine the type of limitation statutes applicable to such actions and the length of the statutory period in the various States. This has been a difficult, and, in many cases, an uncertain task, for in only isolated cases do States have such laws bearing solely on triple-damage suits under the Federal antitrust laws. But in many States the Federal courts have had occasion to determine which of the State statutes applies to and governs the bringing of such actions, and in those instances there is relative certainty. These decisions indicate that the State statutes applied take a wide variety of forms. Included are the limitations governing the following types of actions:

(a) Action for a statutory penalty or forfeiture;

(b) Action on the case;

(c) Action for damages caused by offenses or quasi offenses;

(d) Action on tort;

(e) Action on conspiracy;

(f) Action on liability created by statute, other than a penalty or forfeiture;

(g) Action on liability created by a Federal statute;

(h) Residuary actions—those not specified in other limitation provisions.

In the case of the States involved in these decisions, our survey has relied upon the statutes applied by the courts. With the remaining States, an attempt has been made to choose the statute most likely applicable to triple-damage actions. Thus, in those States where a specific limitation governed actions on liability created by statute, other than a penalty or forfeiture, this provision was chosen. Such a provision appears directly applicable and whenever available was applied by the Federal courts. The Supreme Court held in the Chattanooga Foundry case—Chattanooga Foundry & Pipe Works v. Atlanta (203 U. S. 390)—that a triple-damage action is not a suit for a statutory penalty or forfeiture. In the States having no such provision, a statute similar to one applied by a Federal court was chosen, if available. In many States the residuary statute had to be chosen.

The following table which I shall put in the RECORD at this point shows the length of the statutory period in each State, the statutory description of the type of action which it is thought includes triple-damage suits, the citation to the statute, and citations to cases which have either held the statute applicable to triple-damage actions under the Federal antitrust laws or have refered to it as being applicable:

The very fact of the variety in the periods of limitation in the laws of the several States and the recurring difficulty in determining the period which is precisely applicable demonstrates the need for this amendment.

The 6-year period in the amendment under discussion is not chosen at random, as will be seen from an examination of the schedule which I have just inserted into the RECORD. I do not personally favor Federal statutes of repose of such an extreme duration as some States like Tennessee, 10 years; Indiana, 15 years; and Georgia, 20 years, for in the elapse of years witnesses die, facts grow stale, and evidence disappears. But a 6-year period, representing a happy medium drawn from the experience and judgment of the various States, is eminently sound for Federal purposes.

The present lack of a uniform period of limitations has created confusion, with the choice of forum affecting the result in many cases. In applying State limitation statutes, it must first be determined whether the law of the forum or the place of injury will govern. The ramifications of many large Nation-wide conspiracies present the case of injury occurring in a multiple of States. If the limitation statute of the State where the injury took place governs, a plaintiff who has been injured in several States may choose the forum most advantageous to him in this respect. Conversely, a plaintiff injured in a State with a short statute of limitations may find himself barred from recovery, while another plaintiff, more advantageously situated in a State with a longer limitation period may recover for the identical injury. The proposed amendment would prevent the occurrence of these unjust situations.

This bill is not to be regarded in any sense as a drastic shift in the antitrust laws. It is merely a little step in the right direction. I hope you will pass it.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, the few remarks which I expect to make will be devoted to section 4 (b) of this bill, which is perhaps the most important provision in it.

Section 4 (b) of this bill permits the United States Government to sue for actual, rather than treble, damages sustained by it as a result of violation of the antitrust laws. I want to address myself briefly to that provision.

In 1941 the Supreme Court, in the case of United States v. Cooper (312 U. S. 600), held that the United States is not a "person" within the meaning of the triple-damage sections of the Sherman and Clayton Acts and cannot recover damages for losses suffered through antitrust violations. I recognize a strange inconsistency between such a denial to the United States Government, on the one hand, and the construction of the same statutes in Chattanooga Foundry v. Atlanta (203 U. S. 390) and Georgia v. Evans (316 U. S. 153) to the effect that a municipality and a State, respectively, may recover triple damages. We must, however, take the law as we find it following the Cooper decision.

The reasons persuading me to favor section 4 (b) are simple. The United States is the largest purchaser of goods in the country, spending billions of dollars each year. Much of the purchasing is done by competitive bidding through the medium of sealed bids. Effective, honest competition would naturally result in benefits to the Government in the form of lower prices. If, however, bidders were to conspire and knowingly submit identical bids—as appears to have been done in the Cooper case—the price advantage of competition would disappear.

During the 9-month period ending March 31, 1950, the Defense Department alone purchased $672,000,000 worth of goods through the medium of competitive bidding, plus another $2,304,000,000 in negotiated contracts. I am informed that an undisclosed but significant percentage of these procurement dollars were spent in purchases involving identical bids. This factor alone does not necessarily spell conspiratorial arrangements, but is merely one element to be taken into consideration. Indeed, the case could be that such schemes are present where the bids submitted are all variant according to plan. However, the fact may be, if antitrust violations occur, the Government is injured to the extent that it is deprived of lower prices and in such cases should be entitled to recover.

The normal remedies in civil and criminal proceedings fail to protect the proprietary interest of the Government or to compensate for its losses. The American taxpayer is entitled to full value for his tax dollar. If he were spending the money himself he could sue for triple damages. He is equally entitled to protection if the Government spends it for him.

Some have asked why the committee has seen fit to report a bill confining the Government to recovery of actual damages in these cases, rather than triple damages. The principal reason is that the Government, as contrasted to private suitors, needs no special inducement to bring actions to enforce the antitrust laws, since it is by law already charged with the duty of enforcement. The private suitor, faced with the heavy expenses involved in maintaining his case, the difficulty in securing evidence, and the delay in bringing a case to ultimate disposition, requires the additional incentive of triple recovery. Moreover, because the procurement contracts of the Government run into staggering sums, a loss for which the Government in the event of an antitrust violation might recover could be so enormous that, if tripled, it would completely bankrupt the offending seller, a punitive consequence which the committee felt would be altogether too severe.

The prospect of liability to the Government for damages resulting from antitrust violations will give pause to any concerns which would be inclined intentionally to seek to defraud the taxpayers by overcharging the Government in procurement matters. This knowledge will serve as a substantial deterrent, especially since the Government is not handicapped in the same way as private suitors who find the costs, delays and uncertainties entailed in a triple damage action such as to discourage its commencement. At the same time, there is no unfairness or discrimination in the proposal which would operate to the disadvantage of the honest, legitimate businessmen who comprise the great majority of the American business community.

From every point of view this provision improves and strengthens the Clayton Act.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DENTON].

Mr. DENTON. Mr. Speaker, with the publicity, attention, and public clamor which frequently accompanies the institution of the Government antitrust suit, we frequently forget that antitrust law policy is enforced through a dual-edged sword. Not only is there the Government action which generally demands either fine or injunction, but there is also the suit by the private individual, injured by monopolistic practices, in which just retribution is sought. If in our zealous effort to enforce the antitrust laws more heed is given to the Government case, we must not overlook the private triple-damage suit as a vigorous and effective weapon of the free-enterprise system.

The roots of the triple-damage suit lie deep in Anglo-American jurisprudence. The medieval statute of monopolies, passed by Parliament in 1623, afforded the injured artisan his remedy in the King's courts where three times the damage suffered at the hands of the local monopolist was awarded him. Supposedly, the origins of this private type of action go back even further into history, for the Statute of Monopolies purported to be mere legislative enactment of the principles of the common law.

The framers of the Sherman Act were well aware of the ancient tradition of the triple-damage suit. There is evidence to indicate that they believed the private suitor would be the mainstay of an antimonopoly policy, and that Government suits would simply augment private suits. Such has not been the case. At times, indeed, the triple-damage action has almost fallen into complete desuetude. But in more recent days, the private litigant has had an increasing role in attaining the objectives of the Sherman Act. Triple-damage actions today on the part of the private individual injured by unfair economic practices or monopolistic abuses are a recurring and important phenomenon in the antitrust fabric of the economy viewed as a whole.

What I have said heretofore has been merely by way of preface to the pending legislation of which I am author. I am not attempting to make something complex which is essentially simple. This bill does two principal things.

First, it provides that whenever the United States Government as such is injured in its business transactions or operations through monopolistic or unfair practices in violation of the antitrust laws, the Government may go to court and recover the actual damages sustained by it as a consequence of these violations. Necessity for this legislation arises out of a decision by the Supreme Court of the United States. Under present law, any person injured by violations of the antitrust laws may bring an action for triple damages in the courts of the United States against the corporation or individual which has acted in restraint of trade. The Supreme Court, in two rather anomalous decisions, has held that a State of the Union and a municipality can bring such an action as if they were private parties, but that the Government of the United States is not a "person" within the meaning of the statutes and consequently, remains without any relief, except that afforded by sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act to bring criminal, injunctive, or dissolution proceedings. The first purpose of this bill is to permit the United States to obtain civil relief and recover actual damages sustained as the result of economic practices which violate the antitrust laws.

The principal feature of the bill is to establish a uniform statute of limitations of 6 years for the triple damage suits of private persons to which I made reference in the opening portions of my remarks. At the present time, although the right to bring triple damage suits in the United States courts is accorded through Federal statute, the period of time during which such an action may be commenced is determined by State law. This has resulted in an incongruous antitrust law policy in force throughout the various States of the Union. Ranging from 1 year to 20 years in duration, these various State laws give the antitrust laws differing intonations in different areas of the Nation. The policy of our country against monopolies, restraints of trade, and unfair practices is a national one and should have uniform application throughout the breadth of the land.

As a member of the Subcommittee on Study of Monopoly Power, I have heard businessmen tell us that the antitrust laws are in need of clarification. I believe legislation establishing a uniform time limitation is a long step toward clearing up ambiguities in the antitrust laws. I can think of no greater confusion in antitrust policy than that which arises out of a situation where, if a party is injured through monopoly just within the border of Alabama, he must hasten to bring his suit within 1 year; but if he resides 10 miles away in the State of Georgia, he may rest almost two decades while evidence grows stale, witnesses vanish, and defendants are lulled in false security.

I do not see how this measure can excite much controversy. The Subcommittee on Study of Monopoly Power and the House Judiciary Committee unanimously agreed that this bill should be reported to the floor. The two objects of the legislation I feel are laudable and unobjectionable. Certainly the United States Government should be allowed to recover the actual damages it sustains through the machinations of monopolies. Likewise, in view of the fact that the antitrust laws are basically national in scope and objective, the time limitation for private actions should not fortuitously depend upon the geographical boundaries of the States of the Union. I therefore strongly urge that the House give this bill its serious consideration and that it pass.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this legislation. I think that the Committee on the Judiciary is to be congratulated on bringing it out. The particular provision of the bill which interests me and on which I want to make a few observations, is section 4 (c) which provides that—

> Any action (including an action brought by or on behalf of the United States) to enforce any cause of action under this section shall be forever barred unless commenced within 6 years after the cause of action accrued.

I think it is altogether desirable that there should be a uniform period of limitations applicable throughout the Nation, and that we should not be remitted to the various limitation periods prescribed by the several State statutes. It seems to me regrettable, however, that there is no provision in the bill that the statutory period of limitation shall not commence to run until a conspiracy brought about by fraud or concealment shall become known to the plaintiff. I should like to inquire, if I may, of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], whether I am correct in apprehending that this bill would not affect any State statute concerning the effect of fraud or concealment on the period of limitation.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, may I be permitted to read a note I made in reference thereto?—

> Several States by statute or judicial decree provide for the tolling of the limitation period during the time the defendant fraudulently conceals the cause of action from the plaintiff or is otherwise guilty of fraudulent conduct. I am informed that frequently the statutory period does not begin to run until the plaintiff has discovered the facts of his cause of action which have been fraudulently concealed by the defendant. This bill is not intended to change those rules of the various States insofar as they presently apply to triple-damage actions under the antitrust laws. The period of 6 years, under this bill, will be uniform throughout the United States but the State rules benefiting a plaintiff in a case where the defendant has been guilty of fraud or of some other proscribed conduct will remain in effect.

I would say that the answer to the inquiry would be that you need have no concern on that score.

Mr. HALE. I thank the gentleman for his answer. I am very pleased with the situation as he describes it.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD immediately following the vote.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY].

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, during the roll call on the bill S. 2 I was unavoidably detained. Had I been present, I would have voted "nay."

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, this bill is a compromise. I think it is a splendid compromise. I know of no one who is contesting this compromise. The bill is not in every way the bill that I would write. The bill has been explained. The committee staff has prepared a splendid statement which is embodied in the committee report and which covers every phase of this bill. I cannot state more concisely the purposes and accomplishment of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include excerpts from the committee report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. MICHENER. The excerpts from the committee report read:

STATEMENT

Section 1 of the bill would amend sections 4 and 5 of the Clayton Act by providing that (1) the United States may recover actual damages for injuries to it in its business or property hereafter resulting from violation of the antitrust laws, (2) a 6-year statute of limitations shall apply in all triple-damage antitrust cases, and (3) the provisions tolling the running of the statute of limitations applicable to triple-damage actions, in cases where the United States has brought a civil or criminal antitrust suit, are extended to apply where the United States has brought a suit for damages as well.

Section 2 of the act merely provides that the term "antitrust" shall have the meaning ascribed to it in section 1 of the Clayton Act.

The crucial provisions are those in section 1 of the bill providing, respectively, (1) for extension to the United States of the right to sue for actual damages, a right which it does not now have, and (2) for a uniform 6-year statute of limitations for damage actions in lieu of the present rule which makes the limitation period dependent upon State law.

(1) Suit for damages by the United States: At the present time, as the result of a 1941 Supreme Court decision in United States v. Cooper Corp. (312 U. S. 600), the United States cannot recover, under section 7 of the Sherman Act or section 4 of the Clayton Act, for damages suffered in its business or property as a result of antitrust violations. That case held that the United States is not a person within the meaning of section 7 of the Sherman Act, which gives any person injured as a result of violation of the act the right to sue for triple damages. The present bill would change this rule by permitting the United States to sue for actual, although not for triple, damages.

A brief statement of the background of the Cooper case may be helpful. For the half-year ending March 31, 1937, 18 companies submitted to the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department bids identical to the penny on 82 different sizes of tires and tubes. The same thing occurred in the next half-year period, but with substantially higher prices than for the preceding period. When identical bids were again submitted for the third half-year period (October 1, 1937, to March 31, 1938), the Procurement Division, upon the advice of the Attorney General, rejected the bids and invited new ones. The new bids were identical to those rejected. Determining that a public exigency existed, the Treasury Department negotiated a contract with Sears, Roebuck & Co. In its next invitation to submit bids, the Government required bidders to warrant that the prices bid were not the result of agreement among bidders, with the result that the bids submitted were substantially lower than the previous collusive bids. By comparing these bids with the earlier noncompetitive bids, it was ascertained that the United States had been injured to the extent of $351,158.21 in the three 6-month periods during which it had been unable to buy on a competitive market. A triple-damage action was instituted, but was dismissed for the reason already stated.

The United States is by far the largest single purchaser of goods in this country. Its procurement bill amounts to billions of dollars each year. For the fiscal year 1947, for instance, it exceeded $6,000,000,000, according to the Hoover task force report on the Federal Supply System. In order to secure the advantages of competitive bidding, the Government is required by statute, with some exceptions, to advertise for proposals which are submitted in the form of sealed bids. If the bids are collusive the price advantages of competitive bidding which Congress intended the Government to have, when it enacted the competitive bidding statutes, are lost. According to TNEC Monograph 19, the dollar volume of purchases by the Government in a 12-month period in 1937 and 1938 amounted to $913,401,724.91, of which $87,326,426, or approximately 9.6 percent, was spent in purchases involving identical bids.

These figures do not necessarily indicate antitrust violations. On the other hand, they do not necessarily set an upper limit to the practice of submitting collusive and noncompetitive bids, since instances of collusion are not uncommon in which identity of amount is carefully avoided. In other words, members of an industry have been known to agree as to which one shall submit the lowest bid and at what figure. It would be unrealistic to assume that the same thing does not happen in bidding for Government orders.

The remedies of indictment and injunction cannot protect the Government's proprietary interests or compensate for damages inflicted upon it by collusive bidding—and collusive bidding is only one of the many ways in which the Government may be injured as a result of antitrust violations. Obviously a $5,000 fine is inadequate compensation for damages amounting to $351,158.21, the actual loss suffered by the Government in purchasing only one commodity in the short space of 18 months. Nor would an injunction restraining further collusive activities recompense the United States for damages already suffered.

The American taxpayer is entitled to full value for his tax dollar. He should be protected against its going into the pockets of wrongdoers in the form of excessive prices and profits gained in violation of the antitrust laws. If he were spending the money himself, he could sure for triple damages. He is equally entitled to protection where the Government spends it for him.

The question arises, Why should not the Government recover triple damages just as private persons do, instead of being limited to actual damages? It has been suggested that the wrongdoers might be ruined if the Government were permitted to sue for triple damages, in view of the size of the Government's purchases and the consequent magnitude of the damages that might be awarded. We do not find this argument controlling, however. If a wrongdoer imposes extensive injuries, he should be prepared to bear the burden of extensive damage awards.

A more persuasive justification for limiting recovery to actual damages is that no special inducement need be held out to the Government to institute suit against wrongdoers. The Government, already charged with enforcement of the antitrust laws, needs no incentive.

Liability for damages to the Government resulting from antitrust violations should cause one to think twice before engaging in such violations. The Government buys almost every known type of commodity and there are few businessmen today who do not have occasion to deal with it, often to a substantial extent. Knowledge that they will be liable for damages will serve as a substantial deterrent, especially since the Government does not labor under the handicap of many private victims of antitrust violations who, having suffered financial loss at the hands of the violators, find themselves hard put to obtain the necessary resources to support adequately an action for damages.

We strongly recommend this amendment, and urge its enactment by Congress without further delay—both as an act of fairness to the Government and the taxpayer and as a further deterrent to antitrust violations.

(2) A uniform 6-year statute of limitations: The bill would amend section 4 of the Clayton Act to provide for a 6-year statute of limitations, applicable to both private and United States damage suits resulting from violation of the antitrust laws. It provides that suit may be brought within 6 years after the cause of action accrued. As previously pointed out, it would also amend section 5 of the Clayton Act, which at present provides for tolling the statute covering triple-damage suits during pendency of a civil or criminal antitrust suit by the United States, by providing that the statute would also be tolled by the institution of a suit for damages brought by the United States. The toll could not, however, be invoked by the Government itself in a suit for damages.

At the present time triple-damage actions under the Sherman and Clayton Acts are governed by State statutes of limitations. Chattanooga Foundry & Pipe Works v. Atlanta (203 U. S. 390 (1906)). This situation has created confusion and lack of uniformity, with the choice of forum affecting the results in many cases. A threshold question in applying State limitation statutes is whether the law of the forum or the law of the place of injury will govern. In antitrust cases involving Nation-wide conspiracies, injuries may have occurred in many different States. If the limitation statute of the State where the injury took place governs, a plaintiff who has been injured in several States may choose the forum most advantageous to him in this respect. On the other hand, a plaintiff injured in a State with a short statute of limitations may find himself barred from recovery while another plaintiff, more advantageously situated in a State with a longer limitation period, may recover for the identical injury. Other factors causing adventitious results in these cases are the conflict-of-laws problem and the question whether State or Federal determination of when a cause of action accrues shall be controlling.

The Senate Judiciary Committee has previously in the current Congress held hearings on S. 1910, a bill similar in some respects to the limitations portion of the present bill, except that it contained an added provision for retroactivity and had a special application to suits based upon conspiracy violations. In those hearings the Department of Justice stated that in its opinion "a uniform statute of limitations would be highly desirable and would be consistent with the general policy of making the Federal laws uniform in matters of this character." The consensus of those testifying with reference to S. 1910 was that a uniform statute of limitations in damage suits arising from violations of the antitrust laws would be desirable.

A 6-year limitation appears to be entirely reasonable. Because antitrust violations usually have a complex background, 6 years may well be required to adequately prepare a triple-damage case. Six-year statutes of limitations govern other types of suits, often having less complicated fact structures, such as suits for infringement of patents and claims against the United States. A shorter period here would, in our opinion, be unwarrantedly prejudicial to the injured party. At present it is difficult, if not impossible, in most cases, to determine the applicable period of limitations in the statutes of the various States. Thus, the litigant is often placed at a considerable disadvantage in not being able to make a precise advance determination of whether his suit can be maintained.

To summarize, the provisions which would permit the United States to sue for damages and for a uniform statute of limitations are sound in principle and will undoubtedly have a salutary effect. Private parties in many instances are financially handicapped as a result of the injuries for which they seek redress. They should be given the assistance and encouragement which this bill will give them to move against violators of the antitrust laws. The bill as a whole represents a substantial step forward, both in providing greater protection for those who have been injured and in setting up additional deterrents to violation.

CHANGES IN EXISTING LAW

In compliance with clause 2a of rule XIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives, changes in existing law made by the bill are shown as follows (existing law in which no change is proposed is shown in roman, new matter is printed in italic, and existing law proposed to be omitted is enclosed in black brackets):

"SEC. 4. (a) That any person [who shall be] heretofore or hereafter injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor in [any district court of] the United States District Court for [in] the district in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee.

"(b) Whenever the United States is hereafter injured in its business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws it may sue therefor in the United States district court for the district in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover actual damages by it sustained.

"(c) Any action (including an action brought by or on behalf of the United States) to enforce any cause of action under this section shall be forever barred unless commenced within six years after the cause of action accrued.

"SEC. 5. (a) [That a] A final judgment or decree hereafter rendered in any [criminal prosecution or in any suit or proceeding in equity] civil or criminal proceeding, but not including a suit or proceeding under section 4 (b), brought by or on behalf of the United States under the antitrust laws to the effect that a defendant has violated said laws shall be prima facie evidence against such defendant in any [suit or] proceeding brought pursuant to subsections 4 (a) and 4 (b) [by any other party] against such defendant under said laws as to all matters respecting which said judgment or decree would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto: Provided, [This] That this section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees entered before any testimony has been taken. [: Provided, further, This section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees rendered in criminal proceedings or suits in quity, now pending, in which the taking of testimony has been commenced but has not been concluded, provided such judgments or decrees are rendered before any further testimony is taken.] (b) Whenever any [suit or proceeding in equity or criminal prosecution] civil or criminal proceeding is instituted by the United States to prevent, restrain, or punish violations of any of the antitrust laws, or to recover damages under section 4 (b) of this Act, the running of the statute of limitations in respect of each and every private right of action arising under [said laws] section 4 (a) and based in whole or in part on any matter complained of in said suit or proceeding shall be suspended during the pendency thereof."

The SPEAKER. The question is will the House suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the bill was passed.

OUR FIRST JOB

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, among all the numerous unpleasant facts revealed to the American people by current events in South Korea, two stand out high above all the others; two facts which are so alarming in their implications that they should not be permitted to go unnoticed.

One is the fact that invasion of the South Korean Republic by the Communists of Russia's North Korean satellite marks the essential failure of what at first was called the Marshall plan, and which later became known as foreign aid through the Economic Cooperation Administration.

The other is the fact that national-defense funds appropriated by Congress in the 5 years since VJ-day have not been expended with the good judgment upon which the security of any nation ultimately depends.

Taken together, these two facts add up to a situation wherein this Nation has become involved in a war—and war it is, even though designated as a police action in behalf of the United Nations—relatively unprepared, and far less strong economically than should be the case.

Since 1945 nearly $50,000,000,000 have been appropriated for all forms of national defense, including economic and military assistance to other free nations, and expenditures for maintenance of our own armed services.

Of this amount, approximately $400,000,000—nearly half a billion—has been expended in economic aid by ECA to the Republic of South Korea. Considering the comparative smallness of South Korea in area and population, this is a tremendous sum.

At the same time, Senator ROBERT A. TAFT, who should be well informed, if anyone is, has stated that direct expenditures for military aid in South Korea have totaled only about $200. This, of course, in addition to 140,000 rifles, and little else, left behind when American occupation troops were withdrawn.

Just prior to the invasion from the north, we were told by the White House and the Defense Department that the American officers delegated to train the South Korean Army had done such a good job that the infant republic was well prepared to withstand any possible assault.

Within 24 hours after the invasion started, it became painfully manifest that the expenditure of $400,000,000 in economic aid had not instilled the spirit of freedom in the hearts of the South Koreans. They did not fight as our forefathers fought to create and preserve the American Republic.

The tremendous ECA expenditures in South Korea had made of that country nothing but a sitting duck—and a fat one, at that—to be knocked off at will by the Kremlin stooges from the north.

Undoubtedly the American officers who trained the South Korean Army did the best job possible with the equipment available. And perhaps the South Korean troops should not be blamed too much for running away, instead of standing to fight. Army rifles, of which nearly a third were obsolete, were poor equipment with which to combat 50-ton tanks, machine guns and long range artillery.

Then American troops were thrown into action by the impulsive and unconstitutional act of a President who apparently knew little of the situation. Seemingly he was ignorant of the facts, even though the Korean ambassador has said in a public statement that he warned the White House a month in advance.

Almost at once it became evident that General MacArthur never had been given the additional troops and equipment for meeting all emergencies in the areas for which he now has been made responsible—troops and equipment for which he had pleaded in vain. Troops and equipment which might have been available were scattered around the world, it may be in areas less vulnerable to Communist attack.

Now it appears likely that we shall have to endure a long and bitter fight; a fight which threatens to explode into a world-wide conflict. It may take all of the sacrifice, the loyalty, the utter devotion of which the American people are capable, before we attain ultimate victory. It may be that those for whose freedom we have spent our money, for whom our men are now dying, will fail adequately to assist us.

China was lost as a result of mistaken and well-nigh treasonable foreign policy followed in the Far East by the Fair Deal administration. Now we are fighting in Korea, without the millions of Chinese Nationalist troops we might have had, except for that mistaken policy; troops whose loyalty to us probably would have prevented the present situation entirely. But the Administration has committed us to fight, now at excessive cost in lives and treasure.

It is my own conviction that Congress now should put a stop even to talk about the socialistic proposals of the Fair Deal Administration for excessive expenditures in connection with its legislative program. This is not the time to increase domestic expenditures, whether for so-called social gains or for the political advantage of the party in power.

Let us cut our expenditures here at home to those essential for only the barest necessities. Let us spend the billions thus saved in further arming ourselves and those allies whom the present conflict may prove trustworthy.

Our first duty is to those who are sent to fight and win the war into which gullibility and incompetency have plunged us; and, in the meantime, let us get rid of the friends of "Good Old Joe," of the Achesons, of all of those who do not believe that the liberty of our people, the security of our Nation, is our first duty.

On a dark street, in a tough neighborhood, with men of doubtful purpose about, there is nothing that makes a man feel so safe and gives him so much courage as a club in one hand, a gun in the other.

PURCHASE OF BONDS TO COVER EMPLOYEES OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. KARSTEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 8706) to provide for the purchase of bonds to cover officers and employees of the Government.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 14 of title 6 of the United States Code is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 14. Under regulations promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury, the heads of the departments, and independent establishments of the Government shall, and the appropriate officials of the legislative and judicial branches of the Government may, obtain blanket, position schedule, or other type of surety bonds covering their civilian officers and employees, and military personnel, required by law or administrative ruling to be bonded. Each bond shall be of the most economical type available for the number and type of personnel required to be bonded, and shall be conditioned upon the faithful performance of the duties of the persons so bonded, and the term 'faithful performance of the duties' shall be deemed to include the proper accounting for all moneys or property received by virtue of the bonded persons' positions or employment and all responsibilities and accountabilities imposed by statute or regulation issued pursuant thereto. The bond may cover a period not exceeding two years and the premium shall be paid from funds available for administrative expenses when the contract, or renewal thereof, is made. No bond shall be purchased at a premium rate per individual covered which is more than 35 per centum in excess of the rate of premium for coverage in a like penal sum for a person holding a similar position during the calendar year 1908. If the initial or renewal premium cost exceeds $500 for any bond procured under authority of this section, advertisement for bids shall be required therefor and procurement shall be made from the lowest responsible bidder and through the Administrator of the General Services Administration when so required by him."

SEC. 2. (a) The first sentence of section 3 of title 6 of the United States Code is amended to read as follows: "Every officer whose duty it is to take and approve official bonds (expect those procured pursuant to section 14 of this title) shall cause all such bonds to be renewed every four years after their dates, but he may require such bonds to be renewed or strengthened oftener if he deems such action necessary."

(b) The last sentence of section 6 of title 6 of the United States Code is amended to read as follows: "Except with respect to bonds procured pursuant to section 14 of this title, no officer or person having the approval of any bond shall exact that it shall be furnished by a guaranty company or by any particular guaranty company."

SEC. 3. The analysis of title 6 of the United States Code, immediately preceding section 1 of such title, is amended by striking out the item "SEC. 14. Rate of premium on bond; premiums not to be paid by United States.", and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "SEC. 14. Purchase of bonds to cover officers and employees of the Government."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, we have no requests for time on this side, if the gentleman will just explain the bill.

Mr. KARSTEN. I intend to make an explanation of the bill, I may say to the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation had its origin in one of the recommendations of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government. The Hoover Commission's Report on Budgeting and Accounting recommended the Congress study the whole problem of bonding Federal employees in order to provide a simplified and a less expensive procedure. This measure is based on that recommendation and it will provide the Government with a modern, efficient, and economical system for bonding Federal personnel.

Before the proposed bill was drafted, the Public Accounts Subcommittee, working in close collaboration with practically all of the departments and agencies of the Government, including the Bureau of the Budget and the General Accounting Office, made an exhaustive study of the existing cumbersome and expensive procedure for bonding employees of the Government.

It was found that there are 1,103,000 Federal officers and employees—including 515,000 temporary and seasonal employees of the Post Office Department—who are required to furnish surety bonds in connection with the performance of their official duties. The permiums paid for surety bonds by these employees for 1949 amounted to $1,685,779.90, while the recoveries from the surety companies for the same period amounted to $207,303.70. In other words, the surety companies received over eight times more money than they paid out in losses.

The Hoover Commission also made a thorough study of bonding procedures in the Government and their figures were substantially the same as those compiled by the committee.

This sizable income to the surety companies is at the expense of the Federal employees. It is contrary to the practices of private industry, and State and local governments, which absorb the costs of furnishing surety bonds for their employees who are required to be bonded.

The committee found further that the outmoded bonding procedures existing in the Federal Government today are the result of a 1909 statute, section 14, title 6 of the United States Code, which prohibits the United States from paying any cost of the premium for surety bonds covering Federal personnel. As a result of this old law, Government records of the 1,103,000 individual bonds must be written and maintained in the various Government departments and agencies. It is a tremendous task and very costly. Periodic examination of all these bonds is required from time to time to ascertain whether the Government is amply protected and the bonds are sufficient in penal sum, that they are in force and have not expired, and that the surety is reliable and is on the approved list of the Treasury Department.

All this administrative handling of over a million records is not only burdensome but also it is a very expensive operation for the Government. Although no figures for the actual cost of this function are available, the committee has informal advice from seven of the major departments that approximately $292,789 is spent each year in connection with the maintenance of records for bonded personnel. Considering all of the departments and independent offices concerned with this operation, it is not unreasonable to believe that the annual cost to Government is close to $350,000. This item is really a hidden administrative expense for the reason that it is never budgeted or otherwise indicated in the appropriation of any department or agency.

There are three possible approaches to the problem of bonding Federal employees. The first is to continue the present unsatisfactory system. The second would be to set up a revolving fund financed either by the Government or the employees to which shortages and losses could be charged. This, however, would practically amount to putting the Government into the bonding business. Moreover, it would destroy the desired and wholesome effect which naturally attaches to commercial surety bonds in protection against fraud, negligence, and other wrongful acts. The third course would be to establish a modern bonding program patterned after sound commercial practices, employing blanket and position schedule bonds. The committee chose the latter course.

In drafting legislation to provide a bonding procedure which is efficient and economical for the Government and in line with commercial practices, the committee found that section 14 of title 6 of the United States Code should be amended so as to permit the Government to bear the cost of bonding its employees. With this change of law in mind the subcommittee, while working with the Surety Association of America and the Association of Casualty and Surety Companies, ascertained that the 1,103,000 individual bonds could be reduced to 20,628 by use of the blanket or position schedule bonds, and at the same time give the Government the same amount of coverage and protection for its fiscal and property operations. This enormous reduction in the number of bonds now required to be written will have two effects:

First. It will virtually eliminate the $350,000 hidden expense paid each year by the Government for maintenance of records and files on bonded personnel.

Second. It will create a sound and simplified bonding practice which will give the Government greater protection over its fiscal and property operations, and at the same time promote more efficiency and economy.

Provision is made in the proposed legislation for the payment of premiums 2 years in advance. This will permit the Government to take advantage of a 6⅔ percent discount which the surety companies grant if premiums are paid in this manner. There is also a provision in the bill which requires competitive bidding. In consideration of these two provisions, and also having in mind the virtual elimination of $350,000 hidden administrative expense which the Government now absorbs for maintaining records on bonded personnel, in addition to approximately $225,000 in recoveries that will be received from the surety companies on account of liability, it is believed that the net annual cost for this legislation should not exceed $275,000.

It is the view of the committee that a further reduction in bond premiums can be accomplished by the various departments and agencies. The information developed by the committee disclosed that there are many positions requiring bonds where the employees have no access to property or Government funds. On the other hand, there are positions in which there are employees who should be under bond but are not and there are still other cases where the present bonds are insufficient to adequately protect the Government. It is the belief of the committee, therefore, that the new bonding program proposed by H. R. 8706 should be carefully reviewed during the next 2 years for the purpose of ascertaining what further improvement, economy, and efficiency can be achieved. By doing this, the committee feels that additional savings can be realized not only through a further reduction in the proposed number of blanket and position schedule bonds, but also through a corresponding reduction in premium costs. Moreover, these savings can be accomplished without decreasing the bond protection which the Government must maintain to completely safeguard its fiscal and property transactions.

While it is expected the passage of the bill will result in a small initial cost, I believe this is a wise expenditure because in return the Federal Government will receive insurance against fraud, negligence and dereliction of duty of its employees. It will also receive the tremendous benefits of deterrence against mishandling of the Government's enormous fiscal and property operations which naturally flows from coverage by commercial bonds.

The bill has the approval of the Comptroller General as well as the Bureau of the Budget. It is supported by numerous other departments and agencies of the Government and by various employee organizations. No opposition to the modernization of the Government's bonding program was voiced during the hearings.

Because of the great benefits and protection which will be afforded the Government under this measure for a very modest cost, and because it will provide an up-to-date bonding procedure, efficient and economical and in keeping with sound business practices, I hope the bill will be passed.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. Speaker, the figures on bonded personnel of the Federal Government compiled by the Public Accounts Subcommittee, in collaboration with the various departments and agencies of the Government, indicate very clearly an urgent need for modernizing and improving the existing surety bonding procedure for employees and officers within the Federal service.

The House report on H. R. 8706 reveals that under the present law 1,103,036 individual surety bonds are written and maintained in Government records. Although the Federal Government does not now pay the premium cost for these bonds, undoubtedly administrative cost for handling all these records is an expensive operation for our Government when consideration is given to the fact that each of these bonds must be carefully reviewed from time to time for the purpose of ascertaining whether the bond is sufficient in penal sum, that it has not expired, and the surety company involved is on the approved list of the Treasury Department.

As further pointed out in the report on the proposed legislation, these 1,103,036 individual bonds can be reduced to 20,628 if blanket and position schedule bonds are employed. The use of blanket and position schedule bonds will modernize our present bonding system and bring it in line with the sound practices of private industry, State and local governments. Furthermore, by this enormous reduction in individual bonds, the administrative cost for handling the records of Federal bonded personnel will be virtually eliminated. The subcommittee has information from the departments indicating that the administrative expenses for this operation now costs the Government approximately $350,000 annually.

In comparing this cost alone, with the annual cost of premiums which the Government will absorb under H. R. 8706, sufficient savings will be realized by the Government to pay for the proposed Federal bonding procedure envisioned by this bill.

Because this measure is a great improvement over existing law and will in fact pay for its own operation through savings on our existing bonding system, I hope that the bill will be passed.

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House with reference to the statement made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. KARSTEN] concerning H. R. 8706, a bill to provide for the purchase of bonds to cover officers and employees of the Government.

The gentleman from Missouri has done an outstanding job in sponsoring this piece of legislation and I wish to compliment him. The measure is a progressive step in the field of suretyship and its relation to Federal employees, and it will provide a splendid means for improving our present bonding system. There is no doubt that it will promote more efficiency in our Federal service and undoubtedly in time the Government will realize a great saving in operating under this proposed system for modernizing surety bonding requirements with the Federal Government.

I hope that the whole program of surety bonds as it affects Federal personnel will be reviewed carefully under the provisions of H. R. 8706 with a view toward further improvement.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, we have no requests for time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

REFUNDING OF CUSTOMS DUTIES TO PREPARATORY COMMISSION FOR THE INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 5863) for refund of customs duties to the Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization the sum of $120,000, paid by the Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization to the United States as duties on property brought into the United States for sale to provide funds for the rehabilitation and resettlement of victims of German action pursuant to the agreement entered into on June 14, 1946, by the Government of the United States with the Governments of the United Kingdom, France, Czechoslovakia, and Yugoslavia: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes, and I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, it was neither the desire nor the intent of this Government to profit from sales of looted property, the proceeds of which were designated to promote the rehabilitation of the victims of Nazi persecution.

These exact words are quoted from a State Department letter to the Committee on the Judiciary, in recommending the enactment of H. R. 5863.

But customs duties to the amount of 120,000 have been taken from reparation goods sold in this country to provide funds for the resettlement of those victims of Nazi aggression who could not be repatriated.

This is not only a contradiction of our solemn commitments. If we do not return this money which has been taken to provide revenue when it should have been spared to provide relief, a number of victims will suffer, unjustly.

This may seem like a small matter in the march of great events.

At a time, however, when we are planning a global truth campaign to win the moral support of people everywhere it behooves us to practice what we preach.

The world will judge our words by our ability to back them up. Every time we cut corners on a definite obligation, we sacrifice that much of our credit and our prestige in the eyes of the world.

This is one of those situations where an international agreement that we made in good faith is compromised by one of our domestic laws. The purpose of this bill is to refund the sum collected as duties on reparations sold in this country for the relief of the Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization.

These reparation sales are of a nonrecurring nature.

But first let us look at the background of this case.

World war is frightening, even in retrospect, as we recall the millions of its hapless victims who were subjected to methodical and scientific persecution by the Nazis.

When the survivors were finally liberated, large numbers of them were in desperate need of help to promote their rehabilitation and resettlement.

Many of them had no government to represent them and to receive the reparations that would partially satisfy their needs.

In 1945 and 1946, 18 nations—excluding the Soviet Union—met in Paris to divide reparations. They allocated the nonmonetary gold found in Germany by the allied armed forces for the relief of those victims of Nazi aggression who could not be repatriated.

The Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization is the agency of the United Nations entrusted with this task.

This commission was authorized to sell the retrieved goods at the highest possible value in order to secure funds for the relief of these homeless refugees.

The property classified as nonmonetary gold consisted of personal property such as jewelry, rugs, unmounted precious and semiprecious stones, silver, watches, china and glassware, cameras, and the like, which had been seized by the Nazis from their victims, of whom countless numbers later died in concentration camps. This property was unidentifiable both as to previous ownership and national origin.

The bulk of this property was brought to the United States by the commission in order to get the best price for it. It was sold in a manner that did not affect our domestic economy. At the same time there was every hope of securing maximum funds for the relief of refugees.

That is, until the rigid United States customs laws were invoked, requiring the Preparatory Commission to pay duties of $120,000 on the importation of this property, thereby curtailing the net funds available after final sale and reducing the numbers of victims who might otherwise be helped.

In other words, the Government of the United States promised to assist and then took a profit on its assistance.

If we are to extend charity, it is best that we do so cleanly, and without any kick-backs.

I prefer to think of the customs duties imposed on a special and limited type of property that is brought to this country for the sole purpose of raising relief funds, as the blind and thoughtless application of a rule which can be corrected in the proper way.

To pass this matter over lightly, is the way we would expect the Soviets to act in a similar situation, but not the United States. There is a moral issue here, which cannot be dismissed by a technicality.

One hundred and twenty thousand dollars represents the sole hope of salvation for more than 100 refugees, which we are taking from them, thoughtlessly up to this moment, but deliberately if we fail to refund this commission we have charged on a humanitarian endeavor.

At the Paris Conference on Reparation, to which we were a party, the sale of nonmonetary gold found by the Allied armed forces in Germany to provide relief funds was approved by the signors to that instrument.

A further sum, not to exceed $25,000,000, was allocated for the same purpose, said sum to be raised from a portion of the proceeds of German assets in neutral countries which are available for reparation.

Furthermore, the governments of neutral countries were requested to make available for rehabilitation and resettlement those assets in such countries belonging to victims of Nazi aggression who have since died and left no heirs.

In order to concentrate aid on the most needy and deserving refugees, it was decided to limit such aid to those who were vicitms of Nazi concentration camps, but not including those persons confined in prisoner-of-war camps.

In the Five-Power Agreement of June 14, 1946, it was decided that assets becoming available should be used not for the compensation of individual victims, but solely for rehabilitation and resettlement.

All available evidence indicates beyond any doubt that the overwhelming majority of eligible persons under the provisions of article 8 are Jewish, since they were the principal targets of Nazi hate and terror. Eligible non-Jewish victims of the Nazi extermination policy are refugees from Germany and Austria who can demonstrate that they were persecuted by the Nazis for religious, political, or racial reasons. This latter category also includes German and Austrian nationals, similarly persecured, whose only hope of mending their broken lives, is in emigration to new environments.

In all cases, loyalty to the United Nations is required, as a further test of eligibility.

The conclusion that 95 percent of the heirless funds made available should be set aside to take care of the Jewish victims, recognizes the fact that these funds are overwhelmingly Jewish in origin. The 5 percent made available for non-Jewish victims is based upon a liberal presumption of heirless funds non-Jewish in origin.

This is the broad picture of the common agreement under which the Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization operates.

You and I are presently concerned with a part of that program and how it is being crippled by one of our own laws.

To resolve this conflict and to live up to our word, it is necessary to pass legislation that will direct the Secretary of the Treasury to refund the $120,000 in customs duties that have been collected from the Preparatory Commission.

The Committee on the Judiciary and the State Department recommend such action.

The promptings of good faith and conscience tell us that this is the right and honorable thing for us to do.

I hope and trust that the Congress will not default on this obligation and permit a technicality to cheat us of full performance.

The enactment of H. R. 5863 means that we will carry out our pledge to the International Refugee Organization without short-changing the people it is trying to help.

The cost of this is small.

Its value is great.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, we have no requests for time on this side.

The SPEAKER. The question is, will the House suspend the rules and pass the bill?

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

HOUR OF MEETING TOMORROW

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order on Calendar Wednesday of this week may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

DEPORTATION OF ALIENS FROM THE UNITED STATES

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 10) to facilitate the deportation of aliens from the United States, to provide for the supervision and detention pending eventual deportation of aliens whose deportation cannot be readily effectuated because of reasons beyond the control of the United States, and for other purposes, as amended.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. CELLER. Unless a second is demanded on the other side, I shall demand a second, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a second is considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. The motion that was made was to pass the bill as amended. The amendments are a part of the bill as reported by the committee, or what is the situation?

The SPEAKER. There are some additional amendments.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Not reported by the committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair assumes that the gentleman from Pennsylvania who made the motion was authorized by the committee to make the amendments.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MICHENER. Is this bill called up under a straight suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. Was the motion that the bill be called up under suspension of the rules, together with amendments?

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. MICHENER. How many amendments? Under the rules, they must designate the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands there are committee amendments and amendments to the committee amendments.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CELLER. I think the House should know whether those amendments were approved by the Judiciary Committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER] will be able to answer that.

Mr. CELLER. I have no recollection, as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, that those amendments were approved by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman at least makes a motion to suspend all the rules and pass this bill with amendments, which the Chair thinks is a proper motion.

Mr. CELLER. Can that motion be made to suspend the rules and pass the bill with amendments, if those amendments are simply the amendments of the proposer of the bill who makes the motion and not amendments of the committee?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER] made the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill with amendments. The Chair has recognized the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MICHENER. I have never known a time when you could maintain a motion of that type. The number of amendments must be specified, not just the general statement "with amendments."

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman insists, the Clerk will report the bill as amended.

Mr. MICHENER. I do not insist, but I should like to know whether there is going to be at least definite amendment or whether it is to be left indefinite.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would assume that in the 20 minutes allotted to the gentleman from Pennsylvania he would discuss the amendments.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, is it in order for me to ask that the amendments be read?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following: "That section 20 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917, as amended (39 Stat. 890; 57 Stat. 553; 8 U. S. C. 156), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 20. (a) That the deportation of aliens provided for in this act and all other immigration laws of the United States shall be directed by the Attorney General to the country specified by the alien, if it is willing to accept him into its territory; otherwise such deportation shall be directed by the Attorney General within his discretion and without priority of preference because of their order as herein set forth, either to the country from which such alien last entered the United States; or to the country in which is located the foreign port at which such alien embarked for the United States or for foreign contiguous territory; or to any country in which he resided prior to entering the country from which he entered the United States; or to the country which had sovereignty over the birthplace of the alien at the time of his birth; or to any country of which such an alien is a subject, national, or citizen; or to the country in which he was born; or to the country in which the place of his birth is situated at the time he is ordered deported; or, if deportation to any of the said foregoing places or countries is impracticable, inadvisable, or impossible, then to any country which is willing to accept such alien into its territory. If the United States is at war and the deportation, in accordance with the preceding provisions of this section, of any alien who is deportable under any law of the United States, shall be found by the Attorney General to be impracticable or inconvenient because of enemy occupation of the country whence such alien came or wherein is located the foreign port at which he embarked for the United States or because of other reasons connected with the war, such alien may, at the option of the Attorney General, be deported (1) if such alien is a citizen or subject of a country whose recognized government is in exile, to the country wherein is located that government in exile, if that country will permit him to enter its territory; or (2) if such alien is a citizen or subject of a country whose recognized government is not in exile, then, to a country or any political or territorial subdivision thereof which is approximate to the country of which the alien is a citizen or subject, or, with the consent of the country of which the alien is a citizen or subject, to any other country. If deportation proceedings are instituted at any time within 5 years after the entry of the alien, such deportation, including one-half of the entire cost of removal to the port of deportation, shall be at the expense of the contractor, procurer, or other person by whom the alien was unlawfully induced to enter the United States, or, if that cannot be done, then the cost of removal to the port of deportation shall be at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, and the deportation from such port shall be at the expense of the owner or owners of such vessels or transportation lines by which such aliens respectively came, or, if that is not practicable, at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act. If deportation proceedings are instituted later than 5 years after the entry of the alien, or, if the deportation is made by reason of causes arising subsequent to entry, the cost thereof shall be payable from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act. A failure or refusal on the part of the masters, agents, owners, or consignees of vessels to comply with the order of the Attorney General to take on board, guard safely, and transport to the destination specified any alien ordered to be deported under the provisions of this act shall be punished by the imposition of the penalties prescribed in section 18 of this act: Provided, That when in the opinion of the Attorney General the mental or physical condition of such alien is such as to require personal care and attendance, the said Attorney General shall when necessary employ a suitable person for that purpose, who shall accompany such alien to his or her final destination, and the expense incident to such service shall be defrayed in the same manner as the expense of deporting the accompanied alien is defrayed. Pending final determination of the deportability of any alien taken into custody under warrant of the Attorney General, such alien may, in the discretion of the Attorney General (1) be continued in custody; or (2) be released under bond in the amount of not less than $500, with security approved by the Attorney General; or (3) be released on conditional parole. It shall be among the conditions of any such bond, or of the terms of release on parole, that the alien shall be produced, or will produce himself, when required to do so for the purpose of defending himself against the charge or charges under which he was taken into custody and any other charges which subsequently are lodged against him, and for deportation if an order for his deportation has been made. When such an order of deportation has been made against any alien, the Attorney General shall have a period of 6 months from the date of such order within which to effect the alien's departure from the United States, during which period, at the Attorney General's discretion, the alien may be detained, released on conditional parole, or upon bond in an amount and specifying such conditions for surrender of the alien to the Immigration and Naturalization Service as may be determined by the Attorney General. If deportation has not been practicable, advisable, or possible, or departure of the alien from the United States has not been effected, within 6 months from the date of the order of deportation the alien shall become subject to such further supervision and detention pending eventual deportation as is authorized hereinafter in this section.

"'(b) Any alien, against whom an order of deportation, heretofore or hereafter issued, has been outstanding for for than 6 months shall, pending eventual deportation, be subject to supervision under regulations precribed by the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization, with the approval of the Attorney General. Such regulations shall require any alien subject to supervision (1) to appear from time to time before an officer of the Immigration and Naturalization Service for identification; (2) to submit, if necessary, to medical and psychiatric examination at the expense of the United States; (3) to give information under oath as to his nationality, circumstances, habits, associations, and activities, and such other information whether or not related to the foregoing as the Attorney General may deem fit and proper; and (4) to conform to such reasonable written restrictions on his conduct or activities as are prescribed by the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization in his case. Any alien who is found by the Attorney General to have willfully failed to comply with such regulations, or to have willfully failed to appear or to give information or submit to medical or psychiatric examination if required, or to have knowingly given false information in relation to the requirements of such regulations, or to have knowingly violated a reasonable restriction imposed upon his conduct or activity, shall be thereafter detained in accordance with subsection (c) until such time as the Attorney General orders other disposition of the alien's case. Nothing in this subsection shall preclude the Attorney General at any time from directing removal of any alien of the classes described in subsection (c) from supervision under this subsection to detention as prescribed in subsection (c).

"'(c) Any alien who is deportable under (1) the Act of October 16, 1918, as amended (40 Stat. 1008, 41 Stat. 1008, 54 Stat. 673, 8 U. S. C. 137); (2) the Act of February 9, 1909, as amended (35 Stat. 614, 42 Stat. 596, 21 U. S. C. 171, 174–175); the Act of February 18, 1931, as amended (46 Stat. 1171, 54 Stat. 673, 8 U. S. C. 156a); (3) so much of section 19 of the Immigration Act of 1917, as amended (30 Stat. 889–890; 54 Stat. 671–673, 56 Stat. 1044; 8 U. S. C. 155) as relates to criminals, prostitutes, procurers or other immoral persons, anarchists, subversives and similar classes, may, in the discretion of the Attorney General, be denied the privilege of release as provided in subsection (a) and instead the alien may be taken into custody and transported to such place of detention as may be designated by the Attorney General and there, or at any such other place or places as may therafter be designated by the Attorney General, be detained, though not at hard labor, pending eventual deportation, or until departure from the United States otherwise shall have been arranged, or until the Attorney General, upon sufficient evidence of good cause, shall order supervision of the alien under subsection (b)." In determining whether good cause has been shown to justify releasing the alien and ordering his supervision under subsection (b), the Attorney General shall take into account such factors as (1) the age, health, and period of detention of the alien; (2) the effect upon the national security and public peace or safety; (3) the likelihood of the alien's following a course of conduct which made or would make him deportable; (4) the character of the efforts made by such alien himself and by representatives of the country or countries to which his deportation is directed to expedite the alien's departure from the United States; (5) the reason for the inabilitly of the Government of the United States to secure passports, other travel documents, or deportation facilities from the country or countries to which the alien has been ordered deported; and (6) the eligibility of the alien for discretionary relief under the immigration laws.

"'(d) Any alien subject to detention under subsections (b) or (c) of this section may be released, in the discretion of the Attorney General, from detention under subsection (c) and placed under supervision under subsection (b), on a showing which shall satisfy the Attorney General that the alien has obtained a travel document or made other approved arrangements to leave the United States, and, if considered necessary, upon giving a departure bond conditioned as prescribed by the Attorney General, with good and sufficient sureties approved by the Attorney General. Should any alien return to the United States after having departed pursuant to this subsection and be excluded and his deportation following such exclusion be impracticable, or if he enters the United States unlawfully, he shall again be taken into custody and, regardless of the charges upon which he was deportable, shall be thereafter subject to treatment in accordance wtih subsection (c). In any such case, the previous warrant of deportation against him shall be considered as reinstated from its original date of issuance. The Attorney General is hereby authorized and directed to arrange for appropriate places of detention for those aliens required by this section to be taken into custody and detained. Nothing in this section shall be construed so as to prevent any alien detained under subsection (c) of this section, from questioning, on petition for writ of habeas corpus filed in the district court of the United States of the district wherein he is detained, the validity of such detention.

"'(e) Before the Attorney General may order the release under supervision of any alien detained under subsection (c), he shall prepare and file with all the other papers relating to such case, a synopsis of the evidence upon which such order is to be made, and the reasons for such order.

"'(f) If any alien subject to supervision or detention under subsections (b) and (c) of this section is able to depart from the United States, except that he is financially unable to pay his passage, the expense of such passage to the country to which he is destined may be paid from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, unless such payment is otherwise provided for under this act.

"'(g) No court shall have jurisdiction to release on bond or otherwise any alien detained under any provision of law relating to the exclusion or expulsion of aliens at any time prior to a decision of court in his favor which is not subject to further judicial reviews.'"

Mr. EBERHARTER (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Does the time necessary to read the amended bill come out of the time for discussion?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Will the House have an opportunity to vote separately on the amendments just read? Was that only one amendment that the Clerk read or was it several?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania made a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill as amended, the amendment being to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert other matter.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EBERHARTER. May any further amendments be offered now?

The SPEAKER. No. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER] is recognized.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to state to the House that the detention provisions of this bill apply only to those cases where deportation orders have been issued for the deportation of prostitutes and procurers, of dealers in narcotics, of those criminals who have served over a year and a day in the penitentiary, and subversives.

It certainly seems to me that in protecting the sovereignty of this Nation the least we can do is to take out of circulation, pending such time as they can find a country that will accept them, the class of people that I have just mentioned. There are outstanding today nearly 3,000 orders for deportation of that type of person, and by the refusal of a foreign country to take them back or by their refusal to attempt to obtain the necessary travel documents they enjoy complete freedom of movement and action because they are released on bonds of $500. Furthermore, if it is represented to the court, and the court believes it, that they are unable to provide bonds, they are released on their own recognizance. The records are full of cases of people who have committed one crime upon another, after the order of deportation has been issued. As a matter of fact, the attention of the subcommittee of which I happen to be a member was called to the case of a man who was recently sent to the electric chair after he had twice been ordered deported because of armed robberies. No particular hardship is going to be worked on anyone because, bear this fact in mind, it is not mandatory on the Attorney General to hold people in detention. He is given discretionary power. If in his judgment one of the class of people I have just mentioned ought to be held for paramount national reasons, he may detain him, but he is not obliged to hold anybody, although I trust that in every case of a subversive or a hardened criminal he will.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I have asked the gentleman to yield to point out for the benefit of the House that this bill was reported on August 4 of last year and has been before the Rules Committee for nearly a year; that the gentleman's subcommittee and the Committee on the Judiciary did make a good case before the Rules Committee in favor of this bill; and that in my opinion the great majority of the Rules Committee favored reporting it, but somehow or other there was always delay, delay, delay, and there was never an opportunity for the Rules Committee to vote on this measure.

Mr. WALTER. That of course is true. Today on the floor we witnessed the charge, at least by innuendo, that amendments had been attached to this bill that were not considered by the committee. As a matter of fact, I was directed by the committee to seek the rule with these amendments included in the bill.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. When the bill was presented to the Rules Committee, it was in the same amended form in which it has been presented to the House today. That is the bill upon which the hearings were held before the Rules Committee, the bill as amended.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LYNCH. Will the gentleman explain whether or not any appeal from a court could be had under the bill, or whether it would be possible for the Department to keep a person detained ad infinitum?

Mr. WALTER. No. The remedies available under existing law would in no wise be affected. More than that, the bill was amended by striking out section 2, which insures a hearing under the Administrative Procedures Act, which act was held to be applicable in deportation cases by the Supreme Court of the United States in a recent decision.

No, it certainly seems to me that we have coddled this class of people far too long. I do not know of any other way to deal with the situation, but deal with them we must if we are going to protect the sovereignty of this great Nation.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Do I correctly understand that this applies only to convicted aliens?

Mr. WALTER. The detention provisions of this bill apply only to aliens who have been convicted of the crimes I have mentioned and against whom a warrant of deportation has actually been issued.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to oppose a bill of this character. The main purposes of the bill are laudable, but the procedure that is enunciated in this bill to carry out a laudable purpose, to my mind, is palpably unconstitutional.

The amendments that you have just heard to this important bill are most serious in import. They are lengthy, intricate, involved, and certainly should be considered maturely and unhurriedly, and not with 20 minutes of opposition.

It is not easy for me to stand here and to point out even the unconstitutionality of this bill. But somebody has it to do, and, as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, I am going to do it, regardless of the consequences or the opprobrium which may be heaped upon me for doing so. I speak undaunted, unafraid, because I know I am right.

Mr. Speaker, this bill provides that the worst kind of people have no rights. Well, that is not so. Even a man guilty of treason has rights, and the dope peddler or murderer has a right to trial by jury before he be imprisoned. He has the rights enunciated in our Bill of Rights. But this bill cancels out all those rights, and in effect says certain classes of people, like narcotic-law violators and criminals and prostitutes and procurers and other immoral persons—I do not know what "other immoral persons" may mean—and "anarchists, subversives, and other similar classes"—I do not know what that means—shall be subject to the penalty of detention—indefinite detention, although "not at hard labor."

But the Attorney General is given the right to say that any one of those classes of persons can be detained for a limited period or for an unlimited period. He has the right to designate the place where they shall be detained. He may have them detained in this country or he may have them detained outside the country. He may induce Great Britain, for example, to set up a place of detention or a stockade on the island of Mauritius in the Indian Ocean. He may persuade the French Government, under penalty of having Marshall plan aid cut off—and that is, of course, an extreme case—to set up a Devil's Island off French Guinea, where these persons may be shipped. I wish to goodness we could ship them there. But we cannot and act according to constitutional safeguards. My purpose in appearing here is to warn you against running amuck as far as our Constitution is concerned.

The point is, can we do the things sanctioned by this bill under our Constitution? Shall we give that uninhibited and untrammeled power to the Attorney General to do those things? If you imprison a person, whether you imprison him at hard labor or not, the courts have held time and time again that this is punishment and it is punishment which cannot be inflicted unless there is trial by jury, confrontation of witnesses, indictment by a grand jury, and all the other safeguards which are involved in the judicial process.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. In response to the question asked by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LYNCH], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER], Mr. LYNCH inquired specifically whether or not a person who is picked up by the Attorney General and incarcerated or detained had any right to review—any kind of review?

Mr. CELLER. He has only the right of review by habeas corpus.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. And that is not either a trial or a hearing, is it?

Mr. CELLER. No, sir—that only means the court has a right to see whether or not the Government has followed the process laid down by the Congress.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. By law, that is.

Mr. CELLER. By law only. They cannot inquire beyond that.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. So that if this bill became law, the court would be compelled to dismiss the writ of habeas corpus and rule that the law has given the Attorney General the power to incarcerate or detain persons who may make application for the writ.

Mr. CELLER. That is correct.

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I only have a few minutes to explain my position. I hope the gentlemen will forgive me if I do not respond readily to their inquiries.

I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. O'TOOLE. These people that the gentleman has enumerated have already been convicted by a jury, have they not?

Mr. CELLER. Yes; and I am coming to that. Suppose a dope peddler is being detained. He has served his sentence after trial and conviction. The Attorney General seeks to deport him under our laws. It is within the sovereign right of the Government to deport any undesirable person to his country of origin, but his country of origin refuses to give him travel documents. This is all after he has served his sentence.

The country of the port of embarkation or the country through which he passed en route here, refuses to give him travel documents. Then what happens to this dope peddler who has served his sentence? Under this bill the Attorney General would have the power to put him on Ellis Island. That is additional punishment. He can put him under bond under the bill; put him under surveillance, interrogate him as to his activities, cancel the bond, renew the bond, and, in addition, clap him into some stockade or concentration camp and keep him there. Now, that is imprisonment. You cannot imprison under the Constitution without a jury trial. You can do all this short of imprisonment at Ellis Island as elsewhere.

I say, if you want to get rid of the Communists, if you want to get rid of those who are illegally here—and I want to get rid of them—do it legally, constitutionally. Do not think for a moment I am standing here trying to obstruct the processes that would rid us of these undesirable aliens—but if you would do that, do it right; do it according to the Bill of Rights. Do not do it in disregard of the Constitution. You must provide, then, that mere presence in this country illegally is a crime. And that being a Communist is a crime, and the two put together would then entitle the illegal entrant to the right of a trial by jury. Give him rights to that extent.

But, unfortunately, our Judiciary Committee in its zeal, because of the shadow of Russia, has imperiled constitutional rights. Heaven knows what crimes we ourselves may commit in our haste because of this overwhelming shadow of Russia. We deprive ourselves of our rights because of this shadow. But I am going to stand here, regardless of the criticisms heaped upon me, as chairman of this great Judiciary Committee, and I am going to point out these transgressions to you.

Apparently this Russian shadow makes us lose all sense of proportion.

A great Nation made great of a great Constitution scuttles that great Constitution because of that shadow. In fighting the shadow we will have shorn ourselves of our locks.

I cannot fail to call attention to the following quotation in the famous Wong Wing case (163 U. S. 237), a case almost exactly on all fours with this, involving Chinese laborers. The case goes back to 1895. This Congress, in its unwisdom, passed a statute which said that Chinese laborers, whenever and wherever found, might be placed in a correctional institution, imprisoned by an administrative officer.

The Supreme Court said as follows:

> But to declare unlawful residence within the country to be an infamous crime, punishable by deprivation of liberty and property, would be to pass out of the sphere of constitutional legislation, unless provision were made that the fact of built should first be established by a judicial trial. It is not consistent with the theory of our Government that the legislature should, after having defined an offense as an infamous crime, find the fact of guilt and adjudge the punishment by one of its own agents.

More recently than that is the case of United States against Moreland, decided in 1922, where we find the following excerpt:

> Moreover, the commitment in the Wong Wing case was not under sentence of a court or after conviction by a jury. It was by direction of a commission of the United States.

Just as in this bill it shall be by the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization, and his superior, the Attorney General.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself five additional minutes.

To continue, the excerpt reads:

> The punishment by imprisonment was thus imposed under an Executive order, and hence was clearly void under the Constitution, whatever its character or incidents, its duration, or the place of confinement.

The authors of this bill seek to avoid the taint or charge of imprisonment without trial by saying that the detention shall not be at hard labor. What kind of legal abracadabra is that? What kind of legal subtlety is it that states that you can change like magic something that is unconstitutional into something that is constitutional? Here we have the words in the case of United States against Moreland, supra, "regardless of the character of the imprisonment." Regardless of the incidents, regardless of its duration, regardless of the place of confinement, it is still imprisonment and cannot or should not be had unless there is a trial by jury.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. The gentleman has mentioned the question of criticism or opprobrium. I would say to the gentleman that every Member of this House feels that the gentleman when he speaks of the Constitution and attacks it on that ground is making a conservative argument and is to be commended rather than sharply criticized for bringing these facts to the attention of the House.

Mr. CELLER. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Illegal residence is no crime in the sense that it can be punished by imprisonment. If travel documents cannot be obtained then we must say that the illegality of the residence is a crime and punished in the same way as a crime like burglary, robbery, or anything else. But under these decisions which I have just read you cannot imprison unless you accord the offender the right of trial by jury, which is not done under this bill.

I dislike to oppose anything that is espoused by my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS], one of the ranking members of my committee. I have the greatest respect for him, but I am sure that he will forgive me if I disagree with him and disagree mightily with him, because I think it would be wrong for this House to pass a bill of this character merely because we cannot constitutionally jail people without judicial process. Yes; we have the right, and the courts have so held, temporarily to detain aliens; we can hold them at Ellis Island for a day, or a week, or a month, pending the determination of their rights, but we cannot hold them indefinitely. Under this bill the Attorney General can hold them for 1 day, 1 year, or for life. We know that power corrupts, and absolute power corrupts absolutely. We give absolute power here.

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. HUBER. How long ago would the alleged offense have to have occurred to escape the penalties of this bill?

Mr. CELLER. A person would be subject to the provisions of this bill if he committed one of the enumerated offenses within a period of 10 years prior to the issuance of the warrant of deportation.

Mr. HUBER. Then a young person could commit an offense but lead an exemplary life throughout the subsequent years and still be deported under this bill.

Mr. CELLER. The power is there to detain him for an indefinite period if he could not be deported.

Mr. HUBER. Detained, I mean.

Mr. CELLER. He could be detained and imprisoned.

I am sure the distinguished gentleman who occupies the office of Attorney General presently would not be guilty of any wrongdoing in that regard, but the power is there and we must be very vigilant as to the powers we grant.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. EBERHARTER. The word "subversive" is in this bill. Subversives can be deported or detained. Is there any definition in the bill of the term "subversive"?

Mr. CELLER. There are a number of definitions in the decisions as to what "subversive" is; and the immigration statutes do contain criteria of subversion. I am not worried on that score, but I am worried in other respects.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has consumed the additional 5 minutes.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself three additional minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I can see something of the gentleman's argument that there might be some question as to the legality of the bill because it grants discretion to someone. Could not the bill have been drawn to make it arbitrary and lock these people up right off the bat without letting them run around?

Mr. CELLER. I suppose the gentleman would wish to purge them, as Stalin does.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I would lock them up. I would convict them and keep them locked up.

Mr. CELLER. And ape the activities of the Communist nations against which we inveigh?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I do not want any traitors running around our country.

Mr. CELLER. And you would do what Stalinites would do and what the Communists would do. I do not want that to happen. In endeavoring to kill communism I do not want to kill our own liberties.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. The gentleman made reference to me. I say that is his talk.

Mr. CELLER. I decline to yield further.

I speak of the undue power that is lodged in the Attorney General. He may be a benevolent Attorney General, but the time may come when we may have a malevolent Attorney General. We do not pass these statutes for temporary purposes. We pass them to endure for years, not for a month or a year. I do not know who the successor of the present Attorney General may be. He may be an arbitrary person. Powers once granted, however benevolent, have a habit of getting out of control.

Let me repeat what Judge Brandeis well said in that regard:

The greatest danger to liberty lurks in the insidious encroachment of men of zeal, well meaning but without understanding.

Let me also quote from the minority report of the committee:

In our opinion, this bill would, if enacted into law, introduce into the American system of jurisprudence the anomaly of providing prison terms which in some cases might amount to life imprisonment for persons who, through no fault of their own, are unable to obtain travel documents to foreign countries. It contemplates the creation of detention camps in this country, release from which becomes dependent entirely upon the whim of an administrative officer, since the bill provides no legislative standards for administration. It sets up a procedure for the arrest and in some cases permanent detention of persons in a way which contravenes well-established principles of the United States Constitution.

This legislation is at variance with American traditions of due process. It smacks too much of the lettres de cachet of the Bourbon monarchs or the concentration camps of totalitarian governments. Such provision for concentration camps or stockades should only be invoked when gravest danger threatens the sovereignty of the United States.

This committee, however, has not received evidence of the existence of any such menace.

What is the offense for which this bill proposes to subject an alien to indefinite "supervision and detention"? In many instances simply the failure or refusal of the country of the alien's nationality or last place of residence to issue passport of travel documents permitting the alien to journey from this country to a foreign land. The alien becomes subject to this bill, with all its hardships, even though he may make the most sincere efforts himself to obtain his passport or other authorization to return whence he came. * * *

Also deportation may be to a nonnative country where the language, customs, and mores may be strange or unknown to the deportee. Deportation is possible even to a country where one's life may be endangered. That is conceivably possible where a non-Communist or anti-Communist is forced to go back to Soviet Russia or a satellite country of Soviet Russia there to be purged or liquidated. That to my mind is "cruel and unusual punishment" in violation of the eighth amendment to the Constitution. As was indicated by the late lamented Mr. Justice Murphy in his concurring opinion in the Bridges case (326 U. S. 135, 163–164):

"It is no answer that a deportation proceeding is technically noncriminal in nature and that a deportable alien is not adjudged guilty of a crime. Those are oversubtle niceties that shed their significance when we are concerned with safeguarding the ideals of the Bill of Rights. The impact of deportation upon the life of an alien is often as great, if not greater, than the imposition of a criminal sentence. A deported alien may lose his family, his friends, and his livelihood forever. Return to his native land may result in poverty, persecution, and even death. There is thus no justifiable reason for discarding the democratic and humane tenets of our legal system and descending to the practices of despotism in dealing with deportation."

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, we all appreciate very much the technical position taken by our distinguished friend from New York [Mr. CELLER] in opposition to this bill. We all know that he is just as good an American as anyone else. But I am constrained strongly to disagree with him on the technical position that he takes.

It seems to me that this bill with the amendment that has been offered is a reasonable and justifiable bill under the conditions that exist in the world today. The gentleman from New York says that the bill was reported out of his committee under hysteria of the Soviet Union, I suppose; but in looking at the bill I notice it was introduced on January 3, 1949, and was reported out of committee on August 4, 1949. That is 8 months of consideration. I am sure that the members of the Committee on the Judiciary, all of whom we respect, addressed themselves very seriously to the consideration of this bill.

The gentleman talks about the rights of these people. They can thank God they are in America. But what about the rights of Americans who have been arbitrarily ordered out of countries abroad? Only a few weeks ago Archbishop O'Hara of the Savannah-Atlanta archdiocese in Georgia and an official diplomat of the Vatican, for example, was ordered out of one of the satellite controlled countries of the Soviet Union.

What about the man who has violated the law, a hardened criminal? The country in which he was born will not take him back. Here is another thing to think about: What about other Americans that he might later assault, attack, rape, or murder? What about the man who is a Communist?

They have all received the benefit that everyone of us is entitled to under the Constitution before this bill if it becomes law goes into operation. They are all entitled to a trial and they have received that, whether in the criminal courts, all that you and I can get, or in the civil courts if deportation proceedings are brought against them.

What I am thinking about is, What are the rights of the United States of America to protect itself against those who would destroy the institutions of government that we have? This bill only operates after they have obtained the benefit of every right the Constitution guarantees to a person.

Further, they are entitled to a hearing under the provisions of the administrative procedures law, and they are entitled to what you and I are entitled if we are arrested or apprehended, and we think our rights have been invaded, the right of a petition of habeas corpus. Those are the things that run through my mind and I think, under the circumstances, with the amendment confined to the classes that it is, it is an entirely justifiable and necessary law.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEFAN].

(Mr. STEFAN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks and include excerpts from hearings before the Committee on State, Justice, and Commerce Departments.)

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H. R. 10, known as the Hobbs bill, which has as its purpose the deportation of aliens from the United States and provides for the supervision and detention pending eventual deportation of aliens whose deportation cannot be readily effectuated because of reasons beyond the control of the United States. I feel that the passage of this bill is long overdue because of critical conditions that now exist. It is my understanding that the Department of Justice has been urging passage of this bill for a long time. I have read the minority report on this bill, but I feel that the conditions now are considerably changed from the time the report was written.

When the Director of Immigration appeared before our Appropriations Committee justifying appropriations for the present fiscal year, he indicated alarm over the fact that he was unable to cope with the alien criminal problem because these alien criminals were allowed to wander over our country at large. He indicated at that time that he needed legislation to cope with this very serious problem. He stated about 300 of these alien criminals had been sentenced by our various courts for deportation because of various crimes committed. Among them were over 100 alien criminals who come from countries behind the iron curtain and each one of these approximately 100 alien criminals was reported in the Department files as subversives or Communists. He expressed alarm over the fact that these alien-subversive-Communist criminals appeared to be well supplied with funds and were wandering over our country at will. He thought at that time it was absolutely necessary that a law be passed giving the Attorney General the power to incarcerate these dangerous alien criminals until such time they can be deported. Only a few days ago, I contacted the Department of Immigration again and asked for the status of these approximately 100 alien criminals from behind the iron-curtain countries, and I was informed that the situation was worse at this particular time than it was 6 months ago because the Department had lost track of at least 20 of them. The addresses of some other were not known.

In other words, we have at this time the names of 102 alien criminals recorded as subversives and Communists, well supplied with funds, who are wandering around the country at will, but we do not know where all of them are. It is high time that these Communists be rounded up and placed in jail to partially safeguard the United States.

Mr. Speaker, the committee of which I am a member has the duty to appropriate funds each year for the Department of Justice and the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Membership of our committee is well aware of the great danger to our country from the presence of thousands of subversives who are presently here and who represent a fifth column of potential saboteurs. As one member of this committee having studied this matter over a period of years, I feel that it is high time some action should be taken by way of passage of legislation similar to H. R. 10. The Communist Party in the United States has gone underground. We are officially informed that the party's membership as of February 7 of this year was more than 54,000, that the fact remains that the party leaders themselves have been boasting openly that for every member there are 10 or more others who follow the Communist Party line and who are ready and willing and able to do the party's work. This means that there is a potential fifth column of 540,000 people dedicated to the Communist philosophy which all of us know has as its objective the overthrow of our Government by force and violence.

H. R. 10, if enacted into law, would help plug a wide breach in the internal security of this country—a breach through which the Communists, over the years, have poured traitor after traitor into the heart of America. The inability of the United States Government to deport undesirable aliens, men and women known to have pledged their allegiance to a foreign ideology, represents a tragic and inexcusable restriction upon the right of a free people to defend themselves against a deadly enemy. H. R. 10 should be passed promptly. To delay is to court disaster.

The present immigration laws, with reference to the detention and deportation of undesirable aliens, are grossly inadequate. The hands of American authorities are tied; the evil work of the Communists aided and abetted. The Communists, as might be expected, have played—and are still playing—this loophole in the internal security laws of the United States for all it is worth. They realize that once the foreign agent arrives in this country, nine-tenths of the battle is won. Even if he is identified and exposed, well, getting him out is a tedious, and in some instances, an unsuccessful fight. Even though he has been proven a menace to our country, under our present laws, he cannot be placed in detention quarters continuously until deportation, but may be released on bond. As long as he is in this country he is still available for use by the enemy. The continued presence of these undesirable aliens in this country represents an alarming danger to our national security.

Communist strength in the United States, both open and undercover, is drawn, to a certain extent, from aliens. Many of these individuals have been here for years—yet they have never become citizens. They do not want to become citizens—to do so might necessitate the revealing, in some form or other, their past Communist connections. Rather, they prefer to live as aliens, without the obligations of citizenship. In this capacity they can do their most effective work for the Kremlin masters.

Many of these undesirable aliens are undoubtedly trained espionage and sabotage agents. Some undoubtedly have attended special Communist schools where they have been taught the techniques of civil war and revolution. Many undoubtedly have served the Russian espionage apparatus in other areas of the world. These individuals, now living in the United States, are experienced, professional operators, directing the activities of local party members or lesser members of the espionage ring. They have been sent for a purpose—and they will utilize every available technique, legal or illegal, to remain until that mission is completed. The present immigration laws, which make most difficult their deportation, represent the cloak behind which they so obligingly hide.

Typical of the type of Communist agent who as an alien worked indefatigably against the interests of the United States is Gerhart Eisler. Eisler, as we all now well know, was a most important Communist, a faithful Soviet servant and a bitter foe of everything we hold dear. The roll call of undesirable aliens could be extended to include a number of individuals now occupying important positions in the Communist Party in the United States.

The world situation is tense—the enemy is working to destroy American democracy. To allow the Communists to snuggle, without fear of deportation, within the bosom of this Nation, is manifestly inexcusable. American authorities must have the tools to handle this grievous situation. To identify and expose these aliens is most vital, but it is not enough. America must have the power to expel these parasites who utilize our freedom as a cloak from which to slay free government.

ALIENS FROM IRON-CURTAIN COUNTRIES

Mr. STEFAN. Now, Mr. Commissioner, as regards to deportation of aliens, those to be deported back to their place of origin, those originated in countries behind the iron curtain?

Mr. MILLER. We almost universally fail to get travel documents from their respective countries.

Mr. STEFAN. How many do you have in the United States you cannot deport because they cannot have any place to go?

Mr. KELLY. I think we have between 3,500 and 4,000 total.

Mr. STEFAN. What country are they sentenced to be deported to?

Mr. KELLY. Well, the iron-curtain countries, Poland. The majority of cases are Russian cases.

Mr. STEFAN. Russia, Poland.

Mr. KELLY. Czechoslovakia, the Baltic States, Hungary, Poland, and so forth.

Mr. STEFAN. And you do deport them because they cannot get a travel order to get into those countries; is that right?

Mr. KELLY. That is right.

Mr. STEFAN. They are left here on bond?

Mr. KELLY. No.

Mr. STEFAN. Are they mixed up with our citizens?

Mr. KELLY. That are at large.

Mr. STEFAN. You do not know where they are, do you?

Mr. KELLY. Well, we do our best to keep them located.

Mr. STEFAN. What were they charged with?

Mr. KELLY. I think approximately a hundred cases were deportable under the act of 1918 as amended.

SUBVERSIVE ALIENS

Mr. STEFAN. What is that?

Mr. KELLY. Former membership in proscribed organizations, subversive activities.

Mr. STEFAN. Communists and people with subversive ideas who believe in overthrowing Government by force and violence, and you have no check on them, and they are scattered in society in the United States, is that true?

Mr. KELLY. We have them all under bond.

Mr. STEFAN. They are loose under bond?

Mr. KELLY. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEFAN. How many?

Mr. KELLY. Approximately 100 in the group, and I cannot give you the breakdown as to causes of deportation as to the remainder, but many of these are criminals.

Mr. STEFAN. Here we have 3,500 aliens who have been sentenced to be deported back to where they came from, 100 of whom are people with subversive ideas. Why can you not send them back to Russia?

Mr. KELLY. We have no way of getting them back without travel documents, no steamship company will accept them as passengers if they cannot land them.

Mr. STEFAN. So we are helpless here in the United States and they are running at large. They believe in overthrowing our Government by force and violence.

Mr. MILLER. There are other types, like those hundred or more Hungarians that seem to be well fixed with money and that sort of thing. There is no way that I know of of getting rid of them.

Mr. KELLY. There is legislation before the House that is designed to correct them.

Mr. STEFAN. What does that do?

Mr. KELLY. It would authorize us to keep them under surveillance or detain them.

Mr. STEFAN. You do not know where these 3,500 people are, do you?

Mr. KELLY. Not all of them.

Mr. STEFAN. They are scattered all over the United States; are they not?

Mr. KELLY. As to those who have complied with the alien registration law, we do have a record on them, and I suppose we have a record on a substantial number; as to the subversives, we have a record on each one of them.

Mr. STEFAN. These are not Mexicans. These people come from where communism was born.

Mr. KELLY. These are mostly Europeans; yes, sir.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, H. R. 10 would amend existing laws relating to the deportation of aliens in such a way as to permit the Attorney General to have an effective control over undersirable aliens who, at the present time, cannot be deported because of reasons beyond the control of the United States. There are nearly 3,000 of these undesirable aliens roaming the country, free to come and go as they please, either because their native country or they themselves will not cooperate to facilitate their departure from this country.

Of these 3,000, 1,293 deportation orders against these aliens are based on criminal charges, while another 112 were ordered deported because of subversive activities.

H. R. 10 would give the Attorney General power either to incarcerate these aliens in some place of detention which he would choose or to keep in constant touch with them through periodic personal reports.

This authority is necessary if the Attorney General is to have the proper means of dealing with these recalcitrant cases, since often when the aliens find that the United States is unable to deport them, because their native land is unwilling to take them back, then they themselves make no effort to obtain the necessary papers to permit them to be deported to other countries. However, if these undesirables were faced with the prospect of detention for an indefinite length of time, they might have a little greater incentive to find a country which would be willing to have them.

Certainly each sovereign State has the right to decide which aliens it shall exclude. The privilege of residence here is not a right possessed by every alien who may come to our shores.

Another loophole which this bill closes is the one dealing with the granting of bond during judicial proceedings to determine the deportability of aliens. H. R. 10 provides that no court shall have the jurisdiction to release such an alien on bond or otherwise until the final judicial determination in his favor. If such a provision had been contained in existing statutes, the escape of Gerhart Eisler would not have taken place.

Certainly by this time the nature and character of the work in which subversive elements engage must be obvious to all. They are a menace to our way of life, and, indeed, to our national security. It is ridiculous to be fighting them in South Korea, and yet to be forced to allow them to roam at large here at home, enjoying the privileges of freedoms which they are actively attempting to overthrow.

Perhaps it is understandable that this bill should have failed of passage in previous Congresses, since then the nature of the Communist threat was not so clear, but now there should be no question that a bill of the nature of H. R. 10 is urgently needed.

We cannot afford to allow these Communist agitators and organizers to continue their work to disrupt our industrial plants, which may soon be mobilized for war production or to undermine civilian morale with their untruths and distortions. We would be betraying our pledge to the boys who are fighting on the Asiatic front if we allowed their efforts to be sabotaged on the home front. The sacrifices which they are daily making demand that we take steps here at home to ensure that the victories which they win will not be hollow ones. We must make certain that our country remains free from fifth-column activities so that our will to fight Communist aggression wherever necessary is not sapped by clever sabotage and Communist propaganda.

Passage of H. R. 10 must be an integral part of any effort to control these subversive activities.

Mr. FELLOWS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I am very happy to yield to the distinguished gentleman from Maine, who is one of the minority members of this fine Subcommittee on Immigration that reported this bill.

Mr. FELLOWS. The gentleman from New York is a first-class lawyer. What does he think of the claim that this bill is not constitutional?

Mr. KEATING. In my judgment, the bill is constitutional. In the first place, it has been held time and again that proceedings under the immigration law are civil proceedings and not criminal proceedings. If they are civil proceedings, they are covered by the Administrative Procedure Act, and there is no right to trial by jury.

Secondly, any detention under this act is not imprisonment. It is temporary in character and can be terminated at any time when the detained alien is able to arrange with some country to accept him. Furthermore, his detention can be tested in court through the medium of a habeas corpus proceeding. It seems to me that it must be the law that detention is a necessary incident to the undisputed right of deportation which has been repeatedly held to be an inherent and inalienable right of every sovereign and independent nation.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO].

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, we have had this bill before us for the past 10 years, and it has never become law. Even though it passed once in this House, the Senate refused to dignify it with any consideration and every other House since 1939 has followed the Senate's action. It has never become law because a reasoning Congress, not motivated by hysteria, has rejected and refused to consider this violent assault upon the Constitution of the United States. Now, of course, it is proposed to pass it, to project it upon us in hysteria, with the beating of war drums, and the Constitution will be again flagrantly violated. The action of this House today only proves again that defense of tyranny abroad only means reaction at home. We witnessed the destruction of the civil service rights of Government employees last week, the civil rights legislation was killed the other day for the remainder of this Congress. The week before the administration broke the railroad strike, tearing the rights of labor into shreds. Yes, this bill is proof of what happens to the civil liberties of the people in the midst of a war which is not in the interests of the American people. I propose to continue to resist every phase of this disastrous operation desperation as a duty to my fellow countrymen.

Mr. Speaker, pursuant to permission, I include at this point the following memorandum on H. R. 10 prepared by the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization of the National Lawyers Guild:

Ten years after the Hobbs bill first came up in Congress the present bill, H. R. 10, is before the Judiciary Committee. The present bill makes three proposals which are foreign to our traditions.

I

Deportable aliens are to be sent not alone to the country of their nativity, citizenship, or residence—in certain instances to the port whence they shipped to the United States—but "to any country which will agree to accept such aliens into its territory." (Sec. 20 (a), p. 9, P. G. 20.)

One of the issues raised in the Wickersham Report on The Enforcement of the Deportation Laws by Reuben Oppenheimer was the cruelty involved in sending alien Communists resident in the United States to countries where their lives were endangered even though they might be citizens of such countries (pp. 121–123). The report stops to say "the board of review insisted upon making deportation a death sentence." Under H. R. 10 not only can deportation be made a death sentence, but it may result in deportation to a country, the language and customs of which the alien knows nothing. This is in spirit at least "cruel and unusual punishment" in violation of the Eighth Amendment to the United States Constitution. As was said by Mr. Justice Murphy in his concurring opinion in the Bridges case (326 U. S. 135, 163–164):

"It is no answer that a deportation proceeding is technically noncriminal in nature and that a deportable alien is not adjudged guilty of a 'crime.' Those are oversubtle niceties that shed their significance when we are concerned with safeguarding the ideals of the Bill of Rights. The impact of deportation upon the life of an alien is often as great, if not greater, than the imposition of a criminal sentence. A deported alien many lose his family, his friends, and his livelihood forever. Return to his native land may result in poverty, persecution, and even death. There is thus no justifiable reason for discarding the democratic and humane tenets of our legal system and descending to the practices of despotism in dealing with deportation."

II

The Attorney General is given power of detention over all aliens. Deportable aliens whose deportation cannot be effected within 6 months are, under H. R. 10, subject to the discretion of the Attorney General as to whether they are to be held in custody, paroled under supervision, or released on bond. During the first 6 months it is also put within the Attorney General's discretion whether they will be held in custody, conditionally paroled, or released on bond. Such provision is in violation of the eighth amendment to the United States Constitution providing against the imposition of "excessive bail." It also flouts the recent decision of the circuit court of appeals of the second circuit, which held that the Attorney General under the present law had in the first instance the right to determine whether to release an alien in deportation proceedings on bond but that his discretion was subject to review so as to establish that he was not abusing it (U. S. ex rel Potash v. District Director (169 F. (2d) 747)).

If deportation has not been effected within 6 months "pending eventual deportation" any alien against whom a warrant of deportation has issued shall be subject to supervision under regulations prescribed by the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization, with the approval of the Attorney General.

"Such regulations shall require any alien subject to supervision (1) to appear from time to time before an officer of the Immigration and Naturalization Service for identification; (2) to submit, if necessary, to medical and psychiatric examination at the expense of the United States; (3) to give information under oath as to his circumstances, habits, associations, and activities; and (4) to conform to such reasonable written restrictions on his conduct or activities as are prescribed by the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization in his case." [1]

[1] Sec. 20 (b), p. 13: In connection with the problem of whether incoming immigrants are persons of psychiatric inferiority, the Immigration and Naturalization Service has given some psychiatric examinations. The unsatisfactory character of these examinations is set forth in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 9, 1928 (unbound), pp. 1250 et. seq., especially the statement of Mr. CELLER, in which he says: "Psychiatrists tell me that infinite care and painstaking effort is required in these psychiatric tests. A proper examination takes hours, and sometimes days. The examining agents cannot and would not devote that length of time and care. They have not the time, in the first place. The best type of psychiatrist is the benign, cordial, affable specialist who can draw out his patient. He must act with finesse and never be heavy-handed. Consider the low wages paid in Government service, and I defy anyone to show a psychiatrist worthy of the name in the Public Health or Immigration Service. I do not say this in derogation of these services, but facts are facts, and we have none such" (p. 1251).

Violation of such regulations may result in detention at any place designated by the Attorney General until deported, which may be for life.

In the case of alien criminals or radicals, as well as all those whose arrival has been within the last 10 years, regardless of the reasons for deportation, the Attorney General is given power to transport him to such place of detention as may be designated by the Attorney General and there, or at any such other place or places as may thereafter be designated by the Attorney General, (the alien may) be detained, though not at hard labor, pending eventual deportation, or until departure from the United States otherwise shall have been arranged * * * (sec. 20C, p. 14).

The alien is given the right under H. R. 10 to question the validity of his detention by habeas corpus. This he would have, regardless of the law, and the law provides no grounds for holding the detention invalid, as everything is put wholly within the discretion of the Attorney General. Moreover, under section 20 (g) the courts are expressly denied jurisdiction to order bail unless a decision adverse to the Government has been made which is not subject to further review.

The detention and supervision features of the bill propose radical changes in the treatment of aliens in deportation proceedings. The purpose of these detention provisions—and it must be remembered that parole is in legal effect, imprisonment and "merely an extension of the prison walls" Anderson v. Corall (263 U. S. 193, 196)—is apparent. They present not only an important issue of public policy, but also grave constitutional questions.

What the bill, in its detention provisions, patently proposes to do is not to implement deportation but to establish a system of custody for aliens in deportation proceedings, from the inception of the proceedings until they are held indefinitely after the warrant of deportation issues but cannot be executed.

The indefinite detention provided in paragraph (c) of section 4 of the bill is manifestly criminal punishment quite as surely as it was in the case of Wong Wing v. U. S. (163 U. S. 237–238), even though here the provision for hard labor has been eliminated and indefinite detention (possibly in a concentration camp) is provided rather than imprisonment for not more than 1 year. The Wong Wing case was characterized as follows in a dissenting opinion by Judge Brandeis, which was not in conflict with or challenged by the majority opinion:

"Moreover, the commitment in the Wong Wing case was not under sentence of a court or after conviction by a jury. It was by direction of a commission of the United States. The punishment by imprisonment was thus imposed under an Executive order, and hence, was clearly void under the Constitution, whatever its character or incidents, its duration or the place of confinement" (United States v. Moreland (258 U. S. 433, 443)).

III

The bill seeks to exempt the Immigration and Naturalization Service from the procedural requirements of the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946 (sec. 2 p. 17). Leaving out of consideration the fact that the service has consistently insisted that it was not covered by that act or required to comply with it (8 Monthly Review 103), it is plain that procedural due process as embodied in the Administrative Procedure Act is more important where human liberty and not mere property rights are involved. "Probably more than any other Government agency the Immigration and Naturalization Service sets in bold relief the most difficult problems of interpreting the Administrative Procedure Act" (56 Yale Law Journal, Federal Administrative Procedure Act, 670, 697). The separation of functions has long been urged on the Service. Thus, in the Wickersham report, Mr. Oppenheimer writes (supra, p. 144):

"Members of the same local office make the investigations, conduct the preliminary examinations, decide whether an interpreter is needed, act as interpreter and as stenographer, conduct the warrant hearing, and make a recommendation to Washington as to whether or not the suspect should be deported. Often the same individual acts in a number of these capacities."

The Secretary of Labor's Committee on Administratitve Procedure in its 1940 report on the Immigration and Naturalization Service, pages 78-82, criticized the Combining of the functions of detection and decision, of prosecution and judging.

With a history like this the service, more than any other agency should welcome and abide by the requirements of the Administrative Procedure Act.

The Hobbs bill of 1949, nonetheless than the 1940 version, is a totalitarian measure.[2] Civil liberty is no less destroyed by indefinite imprisonment in jail by Executive order than by detention in a concentration camp. Under the Constitution all persons—aliens as well as citizens—are protected against the tyranny of government.[3] Until now the American people have fully subscribed to the principle that no person is to be punished on account of race or color or alienage. They have recognized that the freedom of all is threatened when the liberty of any group is abridged. If this tradition still persists—and if the Nation is made aware of the implications and the underlying philosophy of the Hobbs bill, it will never become a statute, albeit an unconstitutional statute.

NATIONAL LAWYERS GUILD,
ROBERT J. SILBERSTEIN,
Executive Secretary.

MAY 25, 1949.

(Mr. MARCANTONIO asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks and include a memorandum on the constitutionality of the bill.)

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may require to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. VELDE].

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, the present world crisis demands that Congress immediately put into law H. R. 10, a bill to facilitate the deportation of aliens from the United States and to provide for the supervision and detention, pending eventual deportation, of aliens whose deportation cannot be readily executed because of reasons beyond the control of the United States. I say that the present world crisis demands it, knowing full well that the bill will affect aliens who are not necessarily subversive or harmful to the security of the United States. The bill, if enacted into law and I assume that it will be, will prevent repetition of such infamous crimes as Gerhart Eisler skipping the country and conveying to a potential enemy information which he obtained while allowed to roam through our beloved country unhampered. The bill, of course, will be too late to remedy the injustice done to American people by his treacherous action. It will, however, assure Americans that such treacherous action on the part of enemy aliens or potential enemy aliens will not be repeated. Those few radical left-wingers who oppose this bill yell to the high heavens that we are depriving aliens of substantial rights and would attempt to put an alien living in this country in the same classification with loyal natural-born or naturalized citizens of America. It does not take much imagination or intelligence to see through the purpose of this little left-wing group. In the present crisis they are alining themselves with those undesirables and subversives in this country who would use the constitutional guaranties as a cloak for their attempts to overthrow our form of government by force and violence. It is preposterous and hard to understand why any person who has the opportunity to represent real Americans in this Congress would stoop to such behaviour.

The Department of Justice informs us that there are thousands of aliens in this country who have violated our laws or who are potential saboteurs and espionage agents who cannot be handled effectively under the present law. I believe that the Department of Justice is stating the true facts regarding this issue. Who in the United States would be better qualified to recommend this legislation than the Department of Justice? Having had to deal with aliens throughout the history of this country and especially during the wartime periods, the Department of Justice has gained first-hand knowledge of the situation which cannot be overlooked now. This bill is certainly not unconstitutional and I predict if the question of constitutionality is ever tried, the decision of the Supreme Court will be unanimous.

We have been extremely liberal with aliens who have come to this country and probably most rightly so. We have been, however, too unwary of the aliens who have been sent to this country for evil purposes and have classified them with millions of decent God-fearing immigrants who have in the past made America as great as it is today. While this bill gives the Attorney General powers to deal with that small group of aliens who are here for no good reason, they still have the guaranties of the writ of habeas corpus and other legal rights which naturalized or native-born citizens of this country have.

The left-wing group who are opposing this bill say that by passing it we are giving too much authority to the Attorney General, an administrative officer, to use judgment in the matter of imprisoning without bond or deporting undesirable aliens. At the same time this little left-wing group are constantly demanding that Congress sacrifice more and more and deliver over more and more of its rights, as granted by the Constitution, to the executive branch of Government. They think nothing of voting all kinds of power in other cases to the Members of the Cabinet and other independent administrative offices who rule, or are capable of ruling with an iron hand, our very lives and economy—but when we seek to control a group who are potentially able to destroy the very Constitution under which they seek protection, then they yell to the high heavens. I say it is time that we began thinking of America and the interests of the millions of American citizens who should be protected, and stop sympathizing with the disloyal people in our country who would destroy our American way of life.

[2] As observed by Mr. CELLER in his minority report of the year, H. Rept. No. 397, 76th Cong., 1st sess., the bill smacks too much of the lettres de cachet of the Bourbon monarchs or the concentration camps of totalitarian governments.

[3] Wong Wing v. United States; United States v. Moreland, both supra. See also Yick Wo. v. Hopkins (118 U. S. 356 (1886)); Truax v. Raich, (239 U. S. ss, 41 (1915)).

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remaining time, 4½ minutes, to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS].

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, I wish it were possible in the limited time at my disposal to yield to all who might wish. I see the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK], rising. I am happy to yield to him, but, I beg pardon, I will have to confine my yielding solely to the gentleman from Arizona because I only have 4½ minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact the gentleman has yielded. Before I ask the one question I have in mind, I want to say I have the highest regard for the legal learning and great admiration, as well as appreciation, for the gentleman's fine patriotism. This is the question: I remember in the spring of 1939 a bill of this sort was before the House. I believe it was the gentleman's own bill. I remember I thought highly of that bill and voted for it; my only regret has always been that it failed to become enacted into law then, as I hope it will be now. What is the relationship between the bill at that time and the present bill?

Mr. HOBBS. I must thank the gentleman, both for his graciousness in his complimentary references to me, and for his vote for the 1939 version of the pending bill. This is the sixth or eighth time substantially this same bill has been offered by me. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] is right. It has been before the House for more than 10 years. However, the intimation of the distinguished chairman of our committee [Mr. CELLER] is in error in his minority report on this bill when he says: "This bill was first offered in the Seventy-sixth Congress and died there. This is the fifth edition of the same bill." The insinuation seems clear that this bill died when first offered, and had had no better luck since, when, as a matter of fact, it was passed by a vote of 288 to 61 by the same Seventy-sixth Congress, May 5, 1939, as this House is going to do today. There is nothing in the contention of unconstitutionality of this bill, as I will prove as we go along. Not only was it true as gospel, but as our distinguished majority leader so well said, how short is the shrift given Americans, distinguished members of the diplomatic corps, or churchmen behind the iron curtain. Yet we seem impotent in such cases. But when our guests come here, break their oath of entry, abuse our hospitality, violate our laws, and seek to aid in the overthrow of our Government, it seems to be impossible to get them to go home. So it is, as the then Attorney General, Hon. Tom C. Clark, said in his testimony before our committee, that if this bill had been law the Gerhart Eisler case could never have happened. He also refreshed his recollection from the then head of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, Hon. Ugo Carusi, and asked him how many foreigners who had been finally ordered deported but cannot be deported were then in our country. The reply was: "Five thousand of all countries." Attorney General Clark filed a written statement with Chairman EMANUEL CELLER on May 20, 1949, which the chairman, of course, filed with the committee. From that statement I quote:

> I am informed by the Immigration and Naturalization Service that as of April 15, 1949, there were 3,278 warrants of deportation that were not enforceable. Of the aliens covered by these warrants, 2,147 were so-called iron curtain nationals, and of that number 1,180 were Russians. Of the 3,278 deportation orders, 1,293 were based on criminal or immoral charges and 112 were issued under the act of October 16, 1918, as amended, which relates to subversive classes.

Now that is the case. Not only Gerhart Eiser but every other alien who has committed a crime. As, for instance, Harry Bridges; not because of any hatred of Harry Bridges, but because he was convicted, by due process of law, of the crime of perjury in his application for his naturalization. His application was granted, but having been granted on perjury, his naturalization has since been canceled by proper court decree. Now his nation, Australia, says it will not take him back.

Whether there be 5,000, 3,278, 500 criminal aliens free in this land of ours, who have been ordered deported, but who are thumbing their noses at Uncle Sam, and paying no attention to those orders, we should not longer fail to do our duty.

I say that this bill should be passed. It is constitutional. There can be no question about it. I will cite in my remarks the cases that prove it.

Mr. Speaker, the pending measure, H. R. 10, when it becomes law, will effectuate one single purpose: the restoration of the sovereign power of our Government to deport criminal aliens who have been finally ordered deported but who have never obeyed that order, the vast majority of whom are here enjoying just as much freedom as any law-abiding citizen, although they have been adjudged unfit to remain here after having been given their day in court and every right guaranteed by statute, Constitution, or known to American justice!

Please let me emphasize at the very beginning of our consideration that deportation is not a criminal procedure. It is purely civil. No alien has ever been forced to come here. He agrees in his contract of entry that if we allow him to enter he will observe our laws and will not do anything inimical to our Government. If he abuses our hospitality and violates our laws or seeks to overthrow our government, it ought not to be considered too great a hardship for us to require that he go back home. Like Br'er Rabbit in the Uncle Remus story, he may protest, but the chances are he would be happy to be turned loose in his home briar patch.

Mr. Justice Tom C. Clark, when he was Attorney General, appeared before our Committee on the Judiciary, pleading for the enactment of H. R. 10. I hope every Member of the House will read his letter and testimony. But I wish to invite your attention to one statement which I quote from that letter. Referring to H. R. 10, he said: "Had the legislation here proposed been in effect, such incidents as occurred recently in the Gerhart Eisler case might have been avoided."

The Supreme Court has repeatedly and uniformly held that the right to exclude or to expel aliens, or any class of aliens, absolutely or upon certain conditions, in war or in peace, is an inherent and inalienable right of every sovereign and independent nation.

The exercise of that sovereign power by the United States of America should not be hampered, limited, nor thwarted by any other nation. If it be, by just so much has our Nation lost its sovereignty and independence. The right to detain an alien subject to deportation is but a necessary incident of the right to exclude or deport. Such detention or temporary confinement is not imprisonment nor punishment, so of course there can be no question of double jeopardy.

The decisions of the Supreme Court which established these principles will be cited during the course of these remarks, giving the book and page.

Mr. Speaker, Bishop Warren A. Candler, then the distinguished senior bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was holding a conference upon one occasion and he preached upon a text from that portion of the Scriptures containing the story of Ananias and Sapphira. "God did not strike Ananias and Sapphira dead for lying," that great preacher said. "God does not strike people dead for lying. If He did, where would I be?" A titter which grew into laughter swept that vast audience; that this distinguished prelate should thus involve himself. But immediately he continued. "I will tell you where I would be. I would be standing here preaching to a bunch of corpses."

I am glad that God does not strike people dead for lying, but if He did, it would certainly relieve us of some of the responsibility we are trying to discharge by passage of this bill, for the Red press has been reeking with falsehood concerning this needed reform.

One of the leading opponents of this bill, Mr. Lee Pressman, wrote a letter to every Member of Congress back in 1939 expressing a most reiterated point of opposition, which would be rather serious if it were true:

> This bill would authorize the detention of any alien who has been ordered deported, but who, through no fault of his own, is unable to secure a passport from the government of his native country.

Mr. Pressman continued:

> The result would be that such individuals would be placed in concentration camps for the rest of their lives.

The first one of these quotations is not what men of long experience in the Immigration Service tell me. They say that 9 out of 10 of the aliens who would be affected by this bill remain here as a result of slipping a bribe to one of their local consular agents, or by collusion with their home governments. They remain here, mark you, in spite of a solemn warrant of deportation duly made in conformity with our law, after full and fair hearing in which they had the right to be represented by counsel of their own choosing, and to disprove by any evidence they could adduce, the charges against them. The important ones, who have qualified as efficient propagandists for the overthrow, by force and violence, of our Government and for the establishment of some communistic or anarchistic heaven on earth, have made themselves so valuable to Red Russia, for instance, that Russia will not receive them back, but wishes to keep them here on the job as a part of the fifth column. The unimportant ones—the small fry—have to go down and slip a hundred-dollar bill to some local agent of their foreign government and say: "Now remember, this is not a bribe. I have been trying ever since Christmas to think of something nice to buy for you. Here is something I want you to take and use just as you see fit. There is just one thing I want you to remember, and that is I do not want to go back to Italy"—or to whatever may be his homeland. That is why most of them are still here, so the experts tell me. Occasionally there may be one who, through no fault of his own, is unable to secure a passport from the government of his native country. I grant that. But may I inquire how Uncle Sam is to blame for that? Are the people of the United States to continue being compelled to suffer merely because some criminal alien is so rotten, or so good a propagandist for rottenness, that his home folk refuse to take him back?

And note this well: There is nothing in this bill which requires a detention of any alien until a passport for him can be secured.

There are three other ways by which any alien covered by this bill may be released from the detention required: First, by shipping as a seaman on some vessel bound for a foreign shore, without passport or other authority; second, by obtaining from some foreign government a visitor's visa; third, by obtaining from some foreign government any other form of travel document when passport is not forthcoming. It is inconceivable that many aliens will find it impossible to arrange for their departure from the United States in one of these four ways. By making departure arrangements of any kind, any alien detained under this bill can escape further detention.

Thousands of aliens are coming into our country every month. They know how to get in. Is it conceivable that they could not find a way to get out?

Some of you may not agree with me, or with the law of this land, or with the determination of our duly constituted authorities that such deportable aliens should not be permitted to live here in freedom, merely because of the pretense that they cannot make departure arrangements of some kind. But I say to you that men like Cesare Valenti have never made a valuable contribution to the life of America. They have frequently taken lives which would. And if the deportation proceedings now pending against him result in a final order of deportation, and if arrangements cannot be made for him to return somehow to his native Italy, then I reiterate and insist that some such measure as the pending one should require that he be separated from the free life of America, even though it means detention for life. Keep them here, if you wish, but I do not.

The next question which naturally arises is: Why are they here? The obvious answer is that our laws have been set at naught. Our sovereign powers have failed. In some instances that failure has been due to the whim of caprice of foreign governments; but in the main, they act with solemn assurance in vetoing our right of deportation. They seem to know what they want, and how to get it. Collusion and bribery undoubtedly play their part in forcing us to retain these undesirables. But if none of these things be true, then the only alternative answer is that they are so bad nobody wants them, but the opponents of this bill.

The next question is, What would this bill do? It would simply detain until the aliens themselves or their families or friends see fit to arrange for them to go home.

The effect of this bill is, merely, to extend section 20 of the act of February 5, 1917, to cover cases, not then anticipated, in which the deportees are so bad that no country will suffer their reentrance.

In such cases the beneficent provision of the pending bill is, that they are to be made parlor boarders of Uncle Sam until they can persuade their homefolk to let them come back home. Thereupon they get a free trip back home, at our expense, and are as free as they ever were.

This may be subject to the criticism that it would place an unwarranted burden on Uncle Sam and be too kindly treatment of the worst alien enemies who have outraged our hospitality and bitten the generous hand that fed them; but it cannot be justly said to be harsh, much less cruel.

This detention is in no sense penal. No punishment whatever is inflicted or provided. Hard labor is expressly inhibited. Many a good citizen would welcome an exchange of lots with one of these alien enemy hand biters who will get three good square meals a day and a kindly, comfortable home as long as he wishes.

The "sob sisters," who have joined the Reds in fighting this bill, simply fail to appreciate the meaning of our sovereign right of deportation. Deportation means more than the making of an ineffectual order. It means banishment—the removal of the deportee from the free life of America. Until we banish and remove these poisonous alien elements from circulation in the bloodstream of our body politic we are but a laughing stock—our national sovereignty, in this regard, but a joke.

As long as we acquiesce in the shameful thwarting of our right of deportation, while every Nation that may wish thumbs her nose at us, and, by refusing to take back her poisonous dregs, converts them into free residents of our homeland, our laws are set at naught—our solemn adjudications are as vain as the hand-washing of Pontius Pilate.

What does the word "deportation" mean? Of course, it comes from the Latin "deportare." De—from; portare—to carry or transport. The New Century Dictionary defines it in these terms:

> To carry away, transport, banish, to carry off, remove, especially: transportation from a country by way of banishment or expulsion.

It means nothing less than banishment, and we must see to it that our Nation's deportation orders resume that outmoded connotation. Every free and independent nation has the right of deportation, indisputably. Yet in many cases in past years other nations prevented us from exercising that sovereign right. What are we going to do about it? This bill is an honest attempt to answer that question. Let us pass it.

CONSTITUTIONALITY

The Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly held that the right to exclude or to expel aliens is an inherent and inalienable right of every sovereign and independent nation. As a sovereign and independent nation, the United States of America has that right, indisputably.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, writing for the majority of the Supreme Court in the case of Turner v. Williams (194 U. S. 279, 289) says:

> Repeated decisions of this Court have determined that Congress has the power to exclude aliens from the United States; to prescribe the terms and conditions on which they may come in, to establish regulations for sending out of the country such aliens as have entered in violation of law, and to commit the enforcement of such conditions and regulations to executive officers; that the deportation of an alien who is found to be here in violation of law is not a deprivation of liberty without due process of law, and that the provisions of the Constitution securing the right of trial by jury have no application.

Citing a number of supporting cases: Chae Chan Ping v. United States (130 U. S. 581); Nishimura Ekiu v. United States (142 U. S. 651); Fong Yue Ting v. United States (149 U. S. 698); Lem Moon Sing v. United States (158 U. S. 538); Wong Wing v. United States (163 U. S. 228; Fok Yung Yo v. United States (185 U. S. 296); Japanese Immigrant case (189 U. S. 86); Chin Bak Kan v. United States (186 U. S. 193); United States v. Sing Tuck (194 U. S. 161).

Further quoting from the same opinion:

> Detention or temporary confinement as part of the means necessary to give effect to the exclusion or expulsion was held valid, but so much of the act of 1892 as provided for imprisonment at hard labor without a judicial trial was held to be unconstitutional (idem, p. 291).

The following quotation from the opinion of the Court in the case of Fong Yue Ting v. United States (149 U. S. 698, 705) further establishes the general proposition:

> In the recent case of Nishimura Ekiu v. United States (142 U. S. 651, 659), the Court, in sustaining the action of the executive department, putting in force an act of Congress for the exclusion of aliens, said: "It is an accepted maximum of international law that every sovereign nation has the power, as inherent in sovereignty, and essential to self-preservation, to forbid the entrance of foreigners within its dominions, or to admit them only in such cases and upon such conditions as it may see fit to prescribe." In the United States this power is vested in the National Government, to which the Constitution has committed the entire control of international relations, in peace as well as in war.

Quoting from the Chae Chan Ping case, the opinion in the Fong Yue Ting case proceeds:

Those laborers are not citizens of the United States; they are aliens. That the Government of the United States, through the action of the legislative department, can exclude aliens from its territory is a proposition which we do not think open to controversy. Jurisdiction over its own territory to that extent is an incident of every independent nation. It is a part of its independence. If it could not exclude aliens, it would be to that extent subject to the control of another power. The United States, in their relation to foreign countries and their subjects or citizens, are one nation, invested with powers which belong to independent nations, the exercise of which can be invoked for the maintenance of its absolute independence and security throughout its entire territory.

It is interesting to note that Mr. Justice Brewer, in his dissenting opinion in the Fong Yue Ting case, sets out substantially and clearly the very arguments which the opponents of by bill are now making. I quote from his dissenting opinion, page 733:

I rest my dissent on three propositions: First, that the persons against whom the penalties of section 6 of the act of 1892 are directed are persons lawfully residing within the United States; secondly, that as such they are within the protection of the Constitution and secured by its guaranties against oppression and wrong; and, third, that section 6 deprives them of liberty and imposes punishment without due process of law and in disregard of constitutional guaranties, especially those found in the fourth, fifth, sixth, and eighth articles of the amendments.

But the majority of the Court did not agree with Mr. Justice Brewer. They held the act constitutional.

In the case of Colyer v. Skeffington (265 Fed. 17, 23) the following significant language is used:

There is no constitutional limit to the power of Congress to exclude or expel aliens. He has no vested right to remain.

Mark this well, from the same opinion:

While deportation proceedings are not criminal proceedings, aliens who are thereby deprived of their liberty may have their legal rights to liberty tested on habeas corpus proceedings.

Reverting to the Fong Yue Ting decision, this part, quoted with approval in the Colyer case, is illuminating:

An order of deportation is not a punishment for crime. * * * It is but a method of enforcing the return to his own country of an alien who has not complied with the conditions upon the performance of which the Government of the Nation, acting within its constitutional authority and through the proper department, has determined that his continuing to reside here shall depend.

There are three cases which have been argued strenuously by the opposition, which, when casually read, may be considered as authorities militating against the constitutionality of the pending bill. They are Wong Wing v. United States (163 U. S. 228); United States v. Wallis (279 Fed. 401); and Petition of Brooks (5 F. (2d) 338).

From the Wong Wing case I quote as follows:

We regard it as settled by our previous decisions that the United States can, as a matter of public policy, by congressional enactment, forbid aliens or classes of aliens from coming within their borders, and expel aliens or classes of aliens from their territory, and can, in order to make effectual such decree of exclusion or expulsion, devolve the power and duty of identifying and arresting the persons included in such decree, and causing their deportation, upon executive or subordinate officials.

But when Congress sees fit to further promote such a policy by subjecting persons of such aliens to infamous punishment at hard labor or by confiscating their property, we think such legislation, to be valid, must provide for a judicial trial to establish the guilt of the accused.

No limits can be put by the courts upon the power of Congress to protect, by summary methods, the country from the advent of aliens whose race or habits render them undesirable as citizens or to expel such if they have already found their way into our land and unlawfully remain therein. But to declare unlawful residence within the country to be an infamous crime punishable by deprivation of liberty and property would be to pass out of the sphere of constitutional legislation, unless provision were made that the fact of guilt should first be established by a judicial trial. It is not consistent with the theory of our Government that the legislature should, after having defined an offense as an infamous crime, find the fact of guilt and adjuge the punishment by one of its own agents.

In Ex parte Wilson (114 U. S. 428) this Court declared that for more than a century imprisonment at hard labor in the State prison or penitentiary or other similar institution has been considered an infamous punishment in England and America, and that imprisonment at hard labor, compulsory and unpaid, is, in the strongest sense of the words, "involuntary servitude for crime," spoken of in the provision of the ordinance of 1787, and of the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution, by which all other slavery was abolished, and which declares that such slavery or involuntary servitude shall not exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted.

Applying this reasoning to the fifth and sixth amendments, it must be concluded that all persons within the territory of the United States are entitled to the protection guaranteed by those amendments, and that even aliens shall not be held to answer for a capital or other infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

Our conclusion is that the commissioner, in sentencing the appellants to imprisonment at hard labor at and in the Detroit house of correction, acted without jurisdiction, and that the circuit court erred in not discharging the prisoners from such imprisonment without prejudice to their detention according to law for deportation.

From the Wallis case I quote as follows:

The right to deport does not include any right of indefinite imprisonment under the guise of awaiting an opportunity for deportation.

In the Wallis case the immigration authorities used as an excuse for their procrastination and failure to deport that alien that they could not get transportation back to England. The court said in effect, and very properly, "The war is over; your excuse will not hold water; your alleged inability to secure transportation is a sham; and 4 months is unreasonably long to detain this alien under the pretense that you cannot get transportation for him." But no such case could be presented under this bill. Transportation is no longer a problem. It is landing permits that we lack. Foreign governments are denying landing permits for their own nationals, and by thus refusing are thwarting our Nation's sovereign right to deport those who have been adjudged by our constituted authorities unfit to live here. We cannot run other countries, but we should be able to run our own. So, if we cannot send these, the worst aliens, who have been ordered deported, back home, we can at least keep them out of circulation until they arrange to leave.

From the third case, I quote as follows:

The right to arrest and hold or imprison an alien is nothing but a necessary incident of the right to exclude or deport. There is no power in this court or in any other tribunal in this country to hold indefinitely any sane citizen or alien in imprisonment, except as a punishment for crime. Slavery was abolished by the thirteenth amendment. It is elementary that deportation or exclusion proceedings are not punishment for crime.

It will, of course, be noted at a glance that this decision in petition of Brooks is predicated and built upon the words "in imprisonment." Therefore, we have no quarrel with this decision, since the Supreme Court of the United States has held in the Wong Wing case that detention of an alien pending deportation is not imprisonment. This is necessarily true, for everyone knows that imprisonment is one of the well-recognized punishments for crime and usually includes hard labor. The Brooks case itself says:

It is elementary that deportation or exclusion proceedings are not punishment for crime.

And again:

The right to arrest and hold or imprison an alien is nothing but the necessary incident of the right to exclude or deport.

But even if all three of these supposedly adverse cases said and meant that the detention prescribed by this bill would be prima facie unconstitutional, because not specifically limited, this bill could not be declared unconstitutional. The present bill has made absurd any such contentions by appropriate changes made to meet such hypercriticisms.

These provisions not only eliminate all possibility of the requirement of hard labor of any detained alien but they also strictly limit the period of detention so that it could not possibly extend 1 minute beyond the conclusion of departure arrangements. No one could be held in detention under the provisions of this bill longer than absolutely necessary to effectuate the deportation order against him. And, in the second place, in order to make sure that there would never be any unreasonable detention, it is provided that the Attorney General may at any moment, with or with rescinding the warrant of deportation, release any alien in detention. If there should develop sufficient evidence that the detention of any alien was being prolonged unreasonably, so as to satisfy the Attorney General that this unreasonable duration of detention had become good cause for release, the Attorney General could so order.

But I submit that none of these three cases is subject to the interpretation put upon it by the opposition. I am convinced that the Congress did not pass this Nation's deportation statute in order to place a plaything in the hands of the immigration authorities. Deportation is not a game of tag, just for fun. It is not a trivial matter. It is a solemn duty. When, after full hearings, fairly conducted, in pursuance of the law we have laid down, our duly constituted authorities decree the banishment of an alien, that decree ought to mean something. And that something should be no less than the complete separation from the free life of our Nation.

It is well said by the Supreme Court in the Wong Wing case:

> Proceedings to exclude or expel would be vain if those accused could not be held in custody pending the inquiry into their true character, and while arrangements were being made for their deportation. There is no authority contra.

It is also well said in the case of Becharias v. United States (208 Fed. 143):

> Until the man was actually deported, * * * the proceedings was "pending" within the meaning of the law.

It is thus supported both by authority and reason that Congress has the constitutional right to require detention of an alien ordered to be deported, while arrangements are being made for his deportation, during the whole pendency of negotiation for some kind of departure authority and until deportation shall have become an accomplished fact.

DETENTION IS NOT IMPRISONMENT

> We think it clear that detention, or temporary confinement, as part of the means necessary to give effect to the provision for the exclusion or expulsion of aliens would be valid. Proceedings to exclude or expel would be vain if those accused could not be held in custody pending the inquiry into their true character, and while arrangements were being made for their deportation. Detention is a usual feature of every case of arrest on a criminal charge, even when an innocent person is wrongfully accused; but it is not imprisonment in a legal sense (Wong Wing v. United States (163 U. S. 228, 238)).

DETENTION IS NOT PUNISHMENT

> The right to arrest and hold or imprison an alien is nothing but a necessary incident of the right to exclude or deport. * * * It is elementary the deportation or exclusion proceedings are not punishment for crime (Petition of Brooks, 5 F. (2d) 238, 239).

DETENTION IS NEITHER DOUBLE JEOPARDY NOR DOUBLE PUNISHMENT

Since we have seen clearly that detention is but a part of the necessary proceeding to effectuate deportation, and that it is in no legal sense imprisonment, and not by any stretch of the imagination can it be said to be punishment, it is manifestly absurd to prate of double jeopardy or double punishment by reason of the detention prescribed in this bill in aid of deportation.

CONSTITUTION PRIMARILY FOR CITIZENS, NOT ALIENS

Please let me conclude this discussion of the constitutionality of the pending bill by inviting your attention to that which probably should have been the first point emphasized. Our Constitution and all its amendments were written primarily for citizens of the United States. It is true that in criminal cases, aliens being persons, they are protected by the same guaranties as are citizens. Of course, the courts have held many times that aliens are not entitled to trial by jury nor the ordinary rules of evidence nor procedure in deportation proceedings. They are entitled to due process of law, both in criminal cases and in this strictly civil proceeding for deportation, but they have due process of law shown them in every case, and if the immigration authorities have not given the alien a fair hearing, or if for any other reason he feels himself aggrieved, he may sue out the writ of habeas corpus at any time. But in a number of cases it has been held that no alien has a primary or inherent right to bail, and whatever right in this regard may accrue to him must be granted to him by Congress (United States v. Commissioner (297 F. 946); United States v. Sing Tuck (194 U. S. 161); Wong Wing v. United States (163 U. S. 228)).

And in Li To Hong v. Ebey (25 F. (2d) 714) we read:

> An alien remaining unlawfully in this country, having no right to a hearing unless such a hearing is accorded him by Congress.

So, from a consideration of the decisions from the highest court of our land and many other courts of the most respectable authority, it is as clear as the noonday sun that even the best of our alien population are not entitled to the same rights under our Constitution as is a citizen. Aliens who are not the best, but the worst, are entitled under our law to a great many more rights than they are willing to accord us. Every one of these rights is safeguarded and assured to every alien within the purview of this bill. Fairly construed, it cannot be held unconstitutional.

Let us strain out and remove from the stream of our national life the polluting and poisonous elements.

Aliens because they are alien? No—a thousand times no. Good immigrants have built our Nation. But not the four classes—white slavers, dope peddlers, criminals, and anarchists—which this bill, in kindly way, would urge to go back whence they came. These who have outraged our hospitality, broken our laws, debauched our youth, or plotted to overthrow our Government are not builders. They are wreckers. Their lives stain our flag. Like termites, they undermine and destroy.

Good aliens, who come here as our laws provide they may, and who try to build—not destroy, pollute, or poison—are welcome and appreciated. Millions of such are here. Who of us in this House is not an immigrant per stirpes?

We all pay tribute of grateful homage to those millions of good aliens who have helped make America great. Few may be named, but all in mind.

From Lafayette, Rochambeau, Alexander Hamilton, John Paul Jones, Commodore John Barry, Count d'Estaing, Count de Grasse, Maj. Pierre L'Enfant, General von Kalb, Baron Von Steuben, Gen. Richard Montgomery, Haym Salomon, Gen. Thaddeus Kosciusko, Gen. Casimir Pulaski, Gen. William Alexander, Dr. James Craik, Robert Erskine, Gen. Alexander McDougal, Gen. Lachlan McIntosh, Gen. Hugh Mercer, Gen. Arthur St. Clair, James Wilson, John Witherspoon, Robert Morris, and Albert Gallatin, down through the years to Dr. Sizoo, Dr. Peter Marshall, Mr. Justice Felix Frankfurter, Albert Einstein, and Eduard Benes, aliens have here wrought mightily for good.

Alexander Agassiz, Hjalmar Hjorth Boyesen, Leopold Damrosch, Walter Damrosch, Pierre du Pont de Nemours, Mayor William R. Grace, Franklin K. Lane, Mr. Justice Sutherland, Peter Henderson, Ales Hrdlicka, Ludwig Lewisohn, Jacques Loeb, James McCosh, John Edward McCullough, Henry Morgenthau, Hugo Munsterberg, Thomas Nast, John Boyle O'Reilly, Abraham Mitrie Rihbany, Anton Seidl, Pierre Soulé, Karl Spreckles, Matthew Vassar, Henry Villard, Alexander Wilson, William B. Wilson, James Wilson, Karl Bitter, Gustav Lindenthal, James J. Hill, Jacob A. Riis, Edward D. Baker, Samuel Gompers, Anna Howard Shaw, Eleuthere Irénée du Pont, Stephen Girard, Felix Adler, John Jacob Astor, Emile Berliner, Oscar Hammerstein, Otto Kahn, Franz Lieber, Ottmar Mergenthaler, Albert Abraham Michelson, Johann August Roebling, Jacob Henry Schiff, Carl Schurz, Charles Proteus Steinmetz, Nathan Straus, Theodore Thomas, Michael Anagnos, Joseph Pulitzer, John Philip Holland, Augustus Saint-Gaudens, Alexander Turney Stewart, Edward W. Bok, Knute Kenneth Rockne, Michael Heilprin, Judah Peter Benjamin, James Burnie Beck, Alexander Graham Bell, James Gordon Bennett, Andrew Carnegie, John S. Kennedy, James Pugh Kirkwood, James Laurie, Walter Lowrie, John Muir, Archibald Russell, Michael Pupin, John Ericsson, Louis Agassiz, Dr. Henry Detweiller, Meyer Guggenheim, Henry Rosenberg.

We honor ourselves by honoring such men—American patriots.

Do opponents cry against this bill, "undemocratic"?

If it be undemocratic for us, the duly elected representatives of a sovereign people, to stop a loophole in our deportation law through which hundreds of aliens have escaped their decreed banishment, then we should be just that undemocratic.

Do some say "un-American"?

If it be un-American to restore the last sovereignty of our Nation over deportation, we ought to glory in being just that un-American.

Make no mistake, that flag there—Old Glory—was not the product of silkworms and a dye vat.

Our flag—the most significant in all the world—is a living symbol of America's soul. We 150,000,000 people are in truth the flag.

The purity of common purpose for peace and freedom, plus the morals of the many, put that white honor stripe in our living flag. Our lives besmirch it or keep it white.

The red is not a stripe of shame, nor wrath, but of virility; of flaming youth; of new, aspiring, conquering blood which flows in us and to us from the ends of the earth.

That field against which the stars shine is put into our living flag by the loyalty and devotion of those of us who are "true blue."

Those stars are kept bright by the fervor of the love of those who "star" in our national life.

More than a hundred million souls, by the quiet might of righteous living, keep this symbolic silken flag waving proudly over the real living flag their lives compose. Are we impotent to root out contaminating influences which stain our flag? Do we lack the courage?

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks at this point.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. FURCOLO. Mr. Speaker, the issue is not whether this be a good bill or a bad one. Rather the choice is whether we will be fair to America at the expense of the subversive aliens covered in this bill or whether we will be fair to the subversive aliens at the expense of America.

We must give full and complete protection either to the few hundred people hurt by this bill or to the more than 150,000,000 this bill seeks to protect. We must vote in the full realization that we risk either the liberty of a few noncitizens or the life of this action.

Whatever choice there might be in peacetime, there certainly can be no choice in these days.

If any person covered by this bill has cause to complain, it is not against America. His grievance is against the nation of which he is a citizen, to which he owes allegiance, and to which he is entitled to look for protection and justice. That nation can immediately restore to him every right and privilege that he may lose under this bill. America will quickly cooperate to achieve that end.

Under the circumstances, gladly or reluctantly, we must vote for this bill.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, the passage of this measure is a step toward either dictatorship or fascism. It would deny constitutional guaranties to certain accused persons, and give absolute power to one person to detain those accused of their freedom of movement for life. I shall vote against its passage.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House suspend the rules and pass the bill?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 326, nays 15, not voting 89, as follows:

OUR LEFT HAND VERSUS OUR RIGHT HAND

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, today is the fifth anniversary of the Potsdam Conference. It was at that conference that President Truman sat down with "Pal Joey" to determine the future of the world. It was at that conference that President Truman became convinced that "Pal Joey" was not a bad sort of a fellow at all, but that he was "a man to ride the river with" as they say out West. As late as July 11, 1948, President Truman told an Oregon audience: "I like old Joe. He is a decent fellow, but he is a prisoner of the Politburo." Because this is the fifth anniversary of the Potsdam Conference, and because of the situation we face today in Korea and Asia, and because the crisis in Asia today stems from the Potsdam and Yalta Conferences, this is an opportune time to take stock, to look over the past, and to wonder about the future. I propose to do that today—very briefly but very frankly—because I feel the American people should be given the salient facts that are involved in the present crisis.

Mr. Speaker, Uncle Sam's left hand does not know what his right hand does. Uncle Sam's hands lack coordination, are inconsistent; they work against each other. The result is costly and disastrous. The following are a few examples of the inconsistency that prevails in the activities of Uncle Sam's two hands:

First. Uncle Sam's left hand, being close to his big heart, has decided through President Truman's point 4 program to hand out billions to industry and business in all the backward nations of the world, guaranteeing the loans made for this purpose; but Uncle Sam's right hand is proposing to strangle American industry and American business with new wartime controls and heavier taxes. Are Uncle Sam's leaders in following this program either sensible or consistent?

Second. Uncle Sam's left hand at Yalta, at Potsdam, and elsewhere, handed to "Pal Joey" without hesitation and without strings (a) all of eastern Europe to incorporate behind the iron curtain, (b) $11,000,000,000 worth of war supplies to keep "Pal Joey" on his feet, and (c) all of Manchuria, the Kurile Islands, the half of Sakhalin Island—which paved the way for the present mess in Asia. As a result of this blind generosity, Uncle Sam's right hand has had to spend some thirty-five billions through the Marshall plan for Europe, the Berlin airlift, and aid for China, Greece, and Turkey; but in spite of our spending "Pal Joey" has been able to spread his control, by means of the cold war, over an additional 600,000,000 people since World War II has ended. Should not Uncle Sam's left hand and his right hand get together and work together on the things involving our so-called foreign policy?

Third. Uncle Sam's left hand—the hand nearest the heart—has been coddling, supporting, and protecting Communists and Communist sympathizers in our own Government in Washington ever since F. D. R. recognized "Pal Joey" back in the early thirties, thus enabling these rats to gnaw away at our Government vitals and steal our precious war secrets; while Uncle Sam's right hand has been carrying on a losing fight—the cold war—to contain and limit the spread of Communist influence and control over other parts of the globe. Does it make good sense to spend billions to try to control and contain communism elsewhere in the world, and at the same time coddle, and protect Communists at home?

Mr. Speaker, why does Uncle Sam's left hand work contrary to his right hand? The answer, of course, is that our leaders are confused, shortsighted, and poorly fitted by background and experience to handle either our foreign affairs or our domestic affairs—and they have made just as great blunders at home as they have abroad.

Why cannot we Americans insist upon better team work between our left hand and our right hand? Uncle Sam's hands are our hands. We condone, overlook, and excuse the mistakes our leaders make, and hand out unnecessary billions in taxes to pay for these mistakes. Then we blindly reelect the same leaders or similar ones to repeat the same mistakes over and over again.

We fought World War I "to make the world safe for democracy"—"a war to end all wars." Then our leaders, through the peace treaties they signed, created or made possible a Mussolini, a Hitler, a Stalin, and thus forced the world to go through hell again—World War II—in order to correct the mistakes made by our leaders in settling the problems of World War I.

Mr. Speaker, are we facing world war III as a result of the mistakes our leaders made at Yalta, Potsdam, Cairo, and Tehran? If so, do we want these same leaders to carry on world war III, and do we want these same leaders to make the peace arrangements for us after world war III is over?

These are serious questions that should be given serious consideration by all Americans. Is it not about time that we take it upon ourselves to make Uncle Sam's left hand cooperate with and work with Uncle Sam's right hand? They are our hands, and we are responsible for their actions and activities.

PROGRAM FOR TOMORROW

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to inquire of the majority leader as to the program for tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. The program for tomorrow will be general debate on the military assistance bill.

Mr. HALLECK. Do I understand from that the reading of the bill will go over until Wednesday?

Mr. McCORMACK. The first section of the bill will be read tomorrow, and on Wednesday the bill will be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. I am glad my friend asked the question so that I could advise the Members of the House that tomorrow will be confined to general debate.

Mr. HALLECK. I have had a number of inquiries on this side, so it is well that the Members may know definitely.

CONGRESS SHOULD STAY ON THE JOB

Mrs. HARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there obpection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mrs. HARDEN. Mr. Speaker, the American people today are becoming increasingly fearful that the terrible events in Korea are leading up to a third world war and the possible destruction of the world as we know it.

I do not propose to outline in detail the mistakes, the bungling, and, at times, the treachery which brought about the tragedy which confronts the Christian world today. Rather, I wish to voice the plea that this Congress rise to its responsibility, forego all plans for adjournment, and agree to stay on the job continuously until both victory and lasting peace are in our grasp.

American boys are dying in Korea, faced with tremendous odds and a brutal, Godless enemy. Our immediate task is to reverse those odds, to render every possible aid to those heroic few who man the defense lines of decency and righteousness in far-off Asia. Then, we must seek with all the means at our command to make certain that there will be no more Koreas, no more bloodletting, no more war.

I, for one, do not wish to entrust this job entirely to the executive branch of our Government. Rather, I believe that we, as the elected Representatives of our people, must stay on the job to make sure that everything which must be done is done.

It will involve personal sacrifice on our part. Some of us may lose our seats in this body because of our inability to return home to campaign for reelection. But the life of a single American soldier is far, far more important than dozens of seats in Congress, and I propose that we cast personal comfort and ambition aside and stay on the job here in Washington.

KOREAN ACTION EMPHASIZES THAT ALL BRANCHES OF OUR ARMED FORCES ARE INDISPENSABLE

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. THORNBERRY). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, as a Naval Reserve captain and a veteran of World War I and World War II, I have always been in favor of any organization, agency, or department that adds strength to our national defense.

While my career in the United States Navy is one of which I am proud, my efforts as a legislator have not been confined to that branch of the service. I have maintained a deep interest in the Army, Air Force, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Public Health Service, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Civil Air Patrol.

The best way to examine a legislator's position with respect to national defense is to examine his record. My legislative record is based upon 9 years of congressional service. Four of these years have been served since World War II.

As you know, I am a member of the House Committee on Armed Services. This committee has jurisdiction in general, over legislation affecting all of the armed forces. We deal with Navy, Air Force, Army, and Marine Corps problems, and in time of war the Coast Guard as part of the Navy. We do not deal with appropriations, as such.

It is of interest to review what our committee did during the Eightieth and Eighty-first Congresses. I am particularly gratified that our activities bore no trace of favoritism toward any particular branch of the service, and that at no time did we deviate from our solemn resolve to assist in maintaining an adequate national defense.

In view of the Nation-wide interest in building superior air power as a vital arm of national defense, I should like to discuss the efforts of the House Committee on the Armed Services in behalf of the Air Force.

The National Security Act of 1947, which unified the armed services, was not considered by the House Committee on Armed Services. Because of the complex jurisdictional situations which exist in Congress, the House Committee on Expenditures handled the Unification Act. That is the law that made the Air Force a separate department. But it was the Committee on Armed Services, in 1949, that reported the legislation that made the Department of Defense a single department and made the Departments of the Navy, Army, and Air Force parts of the Department of Defense.

During the Eightieth Congress, we passed a law which, for the first time in the history of the Nation, provided inactive duty training pay for Army and Air Force Reservists on the same basis as that heretofore received by Navy and Marine Corps Reservists and members of the National Guard. I might add that I was a member of the subcommittee that originally reported that bill to the full committee and the House.

We passed an act during the Eightieth Congress, known as Public Law 810, which provided retirement benefits for Reservists in all branches of the service. This law applies to the Air Force as well as the Army and Navy, and, in my opinion, has done a great deal to stimulate interest in our Reserve program. This legislation was perfected by a subcommittee of which I was a member.

We enacted legislation during the Eightieth Congress which authorized the Secretary of the Air Force to proceed with construction at military installations of many items needed for the further development of air power.

For example, that law authorized the appropriation of $410,000 for the completion of a supersonic wind tunnel at the California Institute of Technology. It authorized the appropriation of $152,000 for helicopter engine testing facilities at Kelly Field, Tex. It permitted the expenditure of $2,746,000 for the construction of rocket static testing facilities, a control tower and an all-altitude speed course at Muroc Air Field, Calif. It authorized millions of dollars for the construction of quarters, control towers, utilities, crash truck stations, jet engine testing facilities, gunnery ranges, ammunition storage facilities, rotor wing testing facilities, armament laboratory testing facilities, low-approach instrument landing systems, high frequency direction-finding systems and radio range stations, just to name a few projects at various places through the United States.

It also authorized the expenditure of millions of dollars for facilities in air fields outside the United States such as Ladd Field and Elmendorf Field, in Alaska, Adak Air Field in the Aleutian Islands, and other Air Force bases on the Marianas, the Canal Zone, Iceland, Bermuda, and so forth.

We passed other legislation during the Eightieth Congress which affected the Air Force favorably just as it did the other services. We passed a bill permitting women to become members of the armed services. We passed the Officer Personnel Act of 1947, and we made Air Force General Spaatz a permanent 4-star general.

So far during the Eighty-first Congress we have passed considerable legislation directly affecting the Air Force. We authorized the construction of a guided missiles proving range at Banana River, Fla. This proving range is an Air Force installation, although its facilities can be used by other services. It is the longest guided missile proving range known in the world today, and I wholeheartedly supported this measure. I was a member of the subcommittee that originally considered the bill.

We authorized the construction of a radar fence around the United States. This law permits the Secretary of the Air Force to establish a land-based air warning system and control installations which will enable us to detect the approach of enemy aircraft at long distances. It is now under construction. The United States Air Force is charged with the responsibility for the defense of the United States against air attack, as a result of the so-called Key West conference of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and I completely supported the legislation which authorized the Secretary of the Air Force to proceed with this highly significant defense project. I was also a member of the subcommittee that reported that measure.

We authorized a public works bill for all of the armed services during the Eighty-first Congress. Approximately $238,000,000 of the $596,000,000 authorized in that law will go into Air Force projects in various parts of the world.

We passed a new pay bill for all the armed services which equalizes the pay for all members of the armed services. This was the first complete review of the pay scales of the armed services in 40 years, and I might add that a very determined effort was made on the floor of the House to eliminate flight pay. I objected to the elimination of flight pay. Had this special inducement pay been eliminated, it would have very seriously affected the United States Air Force.

The unitary wind-tunnel bill, which was approved by our committee and the Congress, authorized the construction of nine transonic and supersonic wind tunnels. Six of these tunnels were allotted to the NACA, two to the Air Force, and one to the Navy. It is significant to note that the Navy tunnel was 2 feet by 2 feet at a cost of $6,500,000; whereas the two Air Force tunnels were 8 feet by 8 feet tunnels at a total cost of approximately $70,000,000. While the Navy's contribution in the field of supersonic speeds has been outstanding, I supported the Air Force position in this legislation because of their primary interest in this field. I might also mention that this same law authorized the establishment of an Air Engineering Development Center, which will be operated by the Air Force. It will be devoted to research and development and evaluation studies in connection with every conceivable aspect of the operation of aircraft, guided missiles, and their components in supersonic flight. The ultimate plans for this installation envisage a supersonic center comparable in magnitude to Wright-Patterson Air Force Base in the subsonic field and patterned after similar centers for supersonic experimental work in Germany. Eventually it should be one of the foremost air development centers in the world. I was a member of the subcommittee that reported this extremely important measure.

At this point I should like to discuss the question of the 70-group air force about which we have heard so much. A bill was signed by President Truman on July 10, 1950, which for the first time would authorize by statute in peacetime an Air Force of not to exceed 70 groups. This does not mean that we are going to get it. The bill signed by the President is merely an authorization.

We have heard a lot of talk about the 70-group air force. I would like to call attention to the fact that on April 7, 1948, or over 2 years ago, a subcommittee of the House Committee on Armed Services approved a resolution, which was forwarded to the President of the United States, to the effect that this Nation should have an Air Force with a minimum strength of 70 combat groups, supplemented by the necessary special squadrons, Air National Guard and Air Reserve groups.

The committee further resolved that the funds necessary for a 70-group air force should be appropriated. I was a member of the full committee that unanimously approved that resolution. It was the outgrowth of the findings of the Air Policy Commission, headed by the present Secretary of the Air Force,

Thomas Finletter, the Joint Aviation Policy Board, the then Secretary of the Air Force, Stuart Symington, the then Chief of Staff of the United States Air Force, Gen. Carl Spaatz, and many other officials charged with the responsibility for our national defense. And now, 2 years later, we are finally authorizing the statutory existence of a 70-group air force.

Prior to that time, we fought for larger appropriations for the Air Force. My record in this matter is clear. I advocated the 70-group Air Force in 1948. I voted for additional appropriations for the Air Force in 1948, 1949, and 1950, and I have consistently championed the cause of a large, hard-hitting-highly effective Air Force, just as I have championed the cause of the Navy and the Army and all the other services.

In other words, I have been concerned about air power as deeply as any veteran who has experienced air attacks. No one has to sell the Air Force to me. I worked with the Fifth Air Force in the South Pacific during World War II, and I admired their ability, courage, and efficiency.

I was sufficiently concerned, however, as a result of disturbing reports and ugly rumors in newspapers and magazines, to join Chairman CARL VINSON of the House Armed Services Committee in requesting a complete investigation of all matters surrounding the B–36. The B–36 investigation, that followed, and which resulted in what is officially known as the Report of the Investigation on Unification and Strategy, in the opinion of unbiased observers has done more to bolster the theory of unification than any single project since 1947. It cleared the air of ugly rumors and disturbing reports. It brought the issues out in the open, and our committee gave praise and criticism wherever we felt it was justified. I trust that those who desire to study the B–36 investigation with fairness and objectivity will read the committee report again, in the light of current events.

In this discussion I wish to briefly comment on my attitude with respect to the Navy. I favored a big flush-deck carrier, and I still do. In addition, I favor task forces, and the further development of the art of submarine warfare. I strongly advocate a well-trained, fully equipped, freely operating Marine Corps. I take the position that air power alone, despite its mighty contribution to our national defense, cannot win a war. We are using Infantry, we have called in the Marines, and we have ordered additional fleet units to join the task forces now in the North Pacific. In other words, we are operating in Korea as we must always operate in any kind of a conflict—on a team basis. No single department, no single branch of the service, no single weapon of war ever won a war or ever will win a war. In the words of the poet—

> It's not the individual,
> Nor the Army as a whole,
> But the everlasting teamwork
> Of every bloomin' soul.

During my terms in Congress I have steadfastly maintained that all branches of the service must be given equal consideration. I do not mean that all branches of the service must receive the same amount of money, but I do mean that we cannot weaken one branch of the service to strengthen the other.

In short, our national defense to be adequate depends upon all branches of our Armed Forces coordinating the overall effort to protect this Nation. In such a common endeavor, each branch is indispensable, for together they are our only bulwark against the forces of aggression that if permitted will run hogwild in this turbulent world without a moment's notice.

ADJOURNMENT RUMORS

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES] may extend his remarks in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, every Member of this Congress will agree that we are facing a serious crisis. The extent and magnitude of the crisis is unknown. We do know, however, that there is the threat of total war. Under these circumstances who among us will contend that the Congress of the United States should close its eyes and proceed on a "business as usual" basis? Unfortunately there are some, because that is just what we are doing now. Under these circumstances who among us will contend that Congress should close its eyes, hide its head in the sand, and go home? Unfortunately there are some, because the rumors of a recess or an adjournment rise from every corner of this Capitol. That we should even talk about going home, under these circumstances, is, in my judgment, foolhardy.

Mr. Speaker, there is work to be done. There are plans to be drawn.

The job of planning for the mobilization of wealth, of industry, of manpower is primarily the job of the Congress. It should not be left entirely to the President.

These plans require careful study. The Congress should be at work on them now.

I am not contending that such mobilization plans should be put into effect at this time. I do contend that these plans should be ready. They should be on the statute books for the time when they may be needed.

LOBBYING ACT OF 1946

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, for the first time since the Lobbying Act was passed, you will find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Friday, July 14, which was placed upon the Members' desks this morning, the most complete compilation ever assembled of the information filed by Congress in any calendar year under the Registration Act of 1946. It contains reports from 333 lobbying organizations, which is more than was ever filed for any previous quarter. It contains 961 quarterly reports from paid lobbyists or legislative agents, which was also more than were ever filed in any previous quarter in the history of the act.

Third, both the organizational and individual lobbying reports filed this time are more complete and more candid and give infinitely more information, generally speaking, than those filed for any quarter before this.

CONGRESS SHOULD STAY ON THE JOB

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, in the past several weeks, there has been a great deal of talk about probable adjournment time for the Eighty-first Congress. That such talk could emanate from any Member of this body at the very time that our Nation is undergoing its most dangerous crisis since the close of World War II is shameful indeed. As long as our boys are combating the totalitarian enemy, as long as our Nation stands unprepared for the horrendous eventualities that are within the realm of possibilities, we have no right to pause in our legislative duties. Every member of this House must stand for reelection this November. Some face long drawn out campaign battles. But these are secondary to the national interest today. Our national requirements demand daily, attentive work for their solution, and we must prepare ourselves sufficiently so that the peoples of this earth will have a secure opportunity for a democratic and peaceful life. To do otherwise would lead only to national suicide.

THE CHINESE PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, in an official broadcast from India the other day, Mr. Nehru, the Prime Minister of the Indian Government, stated that India as one of the nations which had given de jure recognition to what he called the Chinese People's Republic, had been working through diplomatic channels to secure that country's admission to the United Nations.

Mr. Speaker, communism in Asia is such a threat to the United States that we are spending hundreds of millions of dollars and sending American boys to die in fighting it. It cannot be right for our Government to be passive in the face of efforts to build the Communist conspiracy up by giving Communist China the recognition, respectability, prestige, and power that admission to the United Nations would give it. Therefore, I hope and trust that our State Department is properly protecting the interests of the United States by working diligently through diplomatic and all other channels to make sure that the Chinese Communist regime will not be admitted to the United Nations, where it could only make trouble for the organization and for all peoples who want to work together to prevent further Communist aggression.

SUPPORT FOR MILITARY FORCES IN KOREA

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, I urge the United States Government to send full aid, men, and materials, to Korea to make sure that our men there have the fullest support.

I believe that "business as usual" must be out as long as the Korean question is unsolved and that the United States Government agencies and the Congress should proceed upon this basis. Government agencies must act quickly and give the Korean supply problem the highest priority.

We must give our fighting men at the front the full reassurance we are all 100 percent behind them with needed and overdue equipment, and the best we have. Let us really put our shoulders to the task and meet the challenge of the situation now.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULTON. I yield to my friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN. I commend my colleague from Pennsylvania and join with him in his request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

FEDERAL SCHOLARSHIP PLAN

Mr. FURCOLO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes and to revise and extend my remarks and include a chart with figures.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. FURCOLO. Mr. Speaker, may it please the House: Back in January of 1949 I called the attention of the Congress to a plan I was proposing that, for convenience, I had termed the "Federal scholarship plan." Although this session of Congress is drawing to a close, I still hope that legislation putting the Federal scholarship plan into effect may be passed by the Eighty-first Congress.

I wish to again call it to the attention of all the Members in the hope that they will give my suggestion their consideration.

The bill I have introduced to carry out the terms of my suggested Federal scholarship plan is H. R. 5852.

The aim of the Federal scholarship plan is to enable at least 5,000 high-school students a year to complete a college education when in the absence of the Federal scholarship plan they would be unable to do so. The plan also serves the same purpose for at least 500 college students a year to continue through postgraduate work.

For the sake of brevity, I will refer only to college and postgraduate higher education, although actually the plan is intended to include students who will continue their education after high school, whether it be in a college or some other institution of learning. The figures used in the appended chart are based on a college period of 4 years or a postgraduate period of 4 years. Since many courses would not take that length of time, it is probable that the Federal scholarship plan would benefit 7,000 or 8,000 students a year, rather than the figure of 5,500 on which the plan is based. And, of course, there would necessarily be some corresponding minor adjustments to be made in the financial figures.

The benefits of the Federal scholarship plan are intended to be furnished at no actual cost to the Federal Government. The Federal Government does provide money in the initial period of operation of the plan, but this money is not provided in the form of the usual appropriation. It is with this understanding that I say that the benefits are made possible by the Federal Government, but still at no actual cost to the Federal Government.

The Federal scholarship plan is based on two major premises: First, no qualified high school or college student should be deprived of a higher education because of financial inability to pay for it; and, second, in its present financial condition, the country is unable to provide that education free of charge.

I hope that eventually the time will come when this country can offer higher education to scholastically qualified students at absolutely no expense to the student. Post-high-school education should be free to those of our students who want and are qualified to continue higher education.

The country has not yet reached the stage where it feels able to provide higher education free of charge. Until that time comes, I advocate the expedient of what I am terming "the Federal scholarship plan."

We must not lose sight of the fact that the country suffers in losing the potential qualities that have not been brought to fruition simply because thousands of individuals have been deprived of educations to fit their individual abilities. It is a public problem directly affecting the welfare of the community, State, Nation, and world. It is for that reason that I am introducing legislation to inaugurate what I have termed "the Federal scholarship plan."

The Federal scholarship plan provides for a method of advancing money to a limited number of qualified students by appropriation of Federal funds for that purpose. The money so advanced is to be repaid by the students at stated intervals over a period of 10 years, beginning after the educational period.

The plan calls for the cooperation of the States in two ways: First, some financial assistance; and, second, selection of students.

The total yearly number of high-school students who will receive money for higher education is set at 5,000. The number of college students who are eligible for Federal assistance to continue postgraduate studies is set at 500. Incidentally, the ratio of these figures can be adjusted to meet the educational needs of the country if a survey shows that the greater need is for postgraduate students.

The amount of money to be advanced to those students continuing on from high school to college studies is fixed at a maximum of $1,000 per year. College students who are going on to postgraduate schools will receive a maximum of $1,500 a year.

The maximum time period for either group is 4 years of college studies for high-school students; or 4 years of postgraduate work for college students.

On the basis of a 4-year term, those granted aid for college or post-high-school studies will repay the Government at the rate of $250 a year for the first 4 years and $500 a year for the next 6 years. Postgraduate students will repay the Government at the rate of $250 a year for the first 2 years, $500 a year for the next 2 years, and $750 a year for the next 6 years. Repayments do not begin until the first year after the study period is completed.

In the year after such payments have been completed so that the entire loan has been repaid to the Federal Government the student will make a "gratuity payment" equal to 10 percent of the total amount advanced to him by the Federal Government. For students who have accepted aid for less than the 4-year basis, the amount of repayment is determined proportionately so as to be fully repaid at the expiration of 10 years from the time of completing their institutional studies.

On the above basis, the Federal Government would "appropriate" about $167,000,000 over a period of 14 years or a little less than $12,000,000 a year for the Federal scholarship plan. Fourteen years after the commencement of the Federal scholarship plan it is unnecessary for the Federal Government to make further "appropriations" because the plan has then become a self-sustaining revolving fund that finances itself. The Federal Government does not get back its "appropriations" for the initial 14-year period until 10 years after the Federal scholarship plan is ended, whenever that may be. The necessary "appropriations" for the first 14 years for the Federal scholarship plan are shown chonologically in the appended chart under "Appropriations."

In addition to the above Federal appropriations, those States that accept the terms of the Federal scholarship plan will contribute at the ratio of $100 for every $1,000 advanced by the Federal Government. The total yearly contribution of all the States is shown on the appended chart under "States." After the first 14 years of operation of the Federal scholarship plan the total expense to the States is figured at $1,150,000 a year or $50 for every $1,000 loaned to the student. The amount per State of course depends upon the population of the State—the students being apportioned among the States by population. The yearly contribution of an average State would be about $48,000 for the first 14 years and about $24,000 thereafter.

The contribution of the States differs from that of the Federal Government in that the Federal Government's contribution is simply a loan, where as that of the States is an outright gift.

The money advanced by the Federal Government to the students is repaid by the students over a 10-year period in the amounts indicated on the chart under "Student repayments." The amounts in that column of the chart are figured after deducting an estimated 10-percent loss on loans not repaid by students because of death, poor risks, and so forth. By the fourteenth year, the yearly repayments of students come to $20,700,000. In addition to that amount, the student also makes a gratuity payment to the Federal Government of 10 percent of the total amount of aid received by him. The total amount of this gratuity payment is $2,300,000, or, again deducting the estimated 10-percent loss, $2,070,000. That gratuity payment is made the year after the student has repaid his entire loan. That amount is shown on the chart under the column headed "10-percent gratuity."

The estimated expenses of administration of the Federal scholarship plan are shown on the chart under "Administration." Beginning with the fifteenth year, and continuing at that yearly figure after that time, the yearly administration expenses are estimated at a maximum of $500,000.

A summary of the plan, as shown on the chart, indicates that when the plan gets under way a total of $23,000,000 a year is being given to approximately 20,000 college students and 2,000 postgraduate students. During the first 14 years the Federal Government has appropriated an average of $12,000,000 a year to make the plan possible. Beginning with the fifteenth year, the Federal scholarship plan is self-sustaining in that the yearly expenses of aid to students and administrative costs run to $23,500,000 a year and the Federal Government is taking in approximately $23,920,000 a year, which consists of student repayments in the amount of $20,700,000 a year—after 10-percent bad-debt reduction—and $2,070,000 a year gratuity repayment—after 10-percent bad-debt reduction—and $1,150,000 per year from the States. That leaves a balance of approximately $420,000 a year which would be available to the Federal Government either to reduce the amount of the States' contribution or to cover an error in the estimated administrative expenses or bad-debt losses.

The Federal scholarship plan must be considered beginning with the fifteenth year after its inauguration, which is when it becomes a revolving, self-sustaining fund. Beginning that year, the Federal Government makes no further appropriation but simply carries the total $167,000,000 appropriation during the initial 14-year period as an accounts receivable, which will be repaid in full 10 years after the completion of the Federal scholarship plan, whenever that may be.

The Federal scholarship plan is not financed by one single appropriation in the true sense of the word. The money advanced by the Federal Government is not an appropriation, but is simply a loan, a continuing loan.

If this continuing loan be interpreted as an appropriation, it is important to note that the appropriations by the Federal Government are simply made for the initial period of the Federal scholarship plan. After the first 14 years the Federal scholarship plan is self-financed and the Federal Government makes no further appropriations.

I will not at this time outline in detail the method of selection of students or the type of administration necessary. Briefly, the number of students allotted to each State would be in proportion to the population of the State. As far as possible, the selection of students would be a function of the individual State, subject only to the restriction that there be no discrimination based on race, creed, or color. As far as possible, the student himself would select the institution in which he wished to continue his higher education. The Federal Government's administrative duties and expenses would simply be in connection with supervising the entire Federal scholarship plan to see that all students were given a fair opportunity to compete within the State and that there was no discrimination based on race, creed, or color. I have felt that the students should be apportioned on a State rather than a National basis, so that students of those States on a lower educational level would not be foreclosed from the plan. If students are not apportioned among the States, the result of national competition might see students from the more highly educated States being the only beneficiaries of the Federal scholarship plan.

The Federal scholarship plan does not interfere in any way with the curriculum of any institution of learning. It does not put the Federal Government into the field of education. Using the same educational system that we now have, it simply enables worthy students to continue their education, where, in the absence of the Federal scholarship plan, they would be financially unable tc do so.

The Federal scholarship plan is intended to help only those students who meet two qualifications: (1) Their high-school work established beyond question that they are good material for post-high-school study; and (2) they are unable financially to pay for higher ducation. The Federal scholarship plan has suitable safeguards to see that those two requirements are not evaded.

Let me emphasize that the Federal scholarship plan is in no way associated with and is not intended in any way to interfere with any Federal-aid-to-education program. Whatever is done to put the Federal scholarship plan into effect is not to be at the expense of Federal aid to education. Any Federal Government money used in the Federal scholarship plan is not to come from any Federal-aid-to-education appropriation.

There may be some who will feel that the Federal scholarship plan will not function because the students will not repay the loan. That is a possibility. I, for one, am willing to risk that possibility. I will have some statistics to present when the legislation comes up that I believe will warrant my stand.

The Federal scholarship plan may perhaps be an answer to that part of the President's budget message—page 146, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 10, 1949—that read as follows:

> It has become increasingly obvious that the national welfare demands that higher education be made available to more of our talented young people. We should now determine the soundest and most practical means of providing additional opportunities for capable young people who could not otherwise afford a college or university education.

I respectfully submit my proposed Federal scholarship plan for the consideration of Members of the Congress.

THE KOREAN SITUATION

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, this is a time for calm and quiet determination at home—not a time for panic. Obviously, things are not going well in Korea. But we are not through there.

Do not forget we were spread thin. Our defenses have to cover three-fourths of the world. We have to depend upon ourselves alone for most of the job. There is not enough at any one point to enable us to fight a war—only enough for a delaying action in a case of full-scale aggression.

But we are rapidly getting in position to do the job in Korea, and we will do the job. We will not be thrown out. These are the things to remember.

We are not in any trouble that we are unable to handle. It will take some time and require the tightening of belts. It will be necessary that we realize that the Communists are playing for keeps; that trouble may break out elsewhere and probably will. We shall need to accept partial mobilization; the substitution of tanks for automobiles on the assembly lines; some curtailment of profits as usual.

Now just why are we in trouble in Korea. Wisely or unwisely, the South Koreans were not trained or equipped for war. It has been our purpose to build for peace.

The American military advisory mission in Korea had for its task the training of Korean security forces to deal with internal security. The armament for such a mission, consequently, consisted of small weapons, a few coastal vessels, and no combat aircraft.

Our troops were withdrawn last June in conformity with arrangements setting up the Republic of Korea. Several hundred persons, comprising the American military mission, remained behind to train the Korean constabulary.

The situation along the thirty-eighth parallel was only one of six in which the Russians maintained military build-ups. Those six Soviet-backed military build-ups were threats against the following countries: Iran, Indochina, Formosa, Germany, Yugoslavia, Greece—the whole Macedonian area.

Because of its military power in being along the borders of these countries, the Soviet camp can move against any particular target or groups of targets, just as they did against South Korea.

Obviously, the United States, with its ever-mounting responsibilities, could not maintain military forces of equal strength in being at all those particular areas, in addition to meeting the other requirements we have.

For the past 18 months, northern Korean forces have been massed in strength on the north side of the thirty-eighth parallel. There were frequent border incidents involving as many as several thousand troops. In the face of this knowledge on our part, it was still possible for the aggressor to achieve tactical surprise, and this is understandable. The Korean situation constituted a calculated risk weighed against the over-all global military-political situation.

Once the North Korean forces moved against the Republic of Korea, the aggressor had a great advantage. He had superiority of numbers, equipment, fire power, and was aided and abetted by saboteurs, fifth columnists, and his cause was served by confusion and disorganization.

The history of aggressors in our day attests to the strong advantage which accrues to the ruthless international criminal when he violates all rules of international law, justice, and decency and resorts to naked force as a policy of aggrandizement.

The decision of President Truman to join the fight was a recognition on his part of the moral issue at stake, as well as the political-ideological issues involved, above and beyond the actual military factors; when we moved into the battle as a result of his order as Commander in Chief we were in effect reversing purely military policy. The public expression of opinion which attended the Chief Executive's decison was confirmation of the fact that the rank and file of Americans agreed with him that the time had come to call a halt to Communist aggression, and that, with other members of the United Nations, we were prepared to meet force with force to rid the world of this threat and restore peace.

The task of getting adequate forces into Korea, once we had joined the fight against aggression, was a most formidable one. Railroad facilities left much to be desired, roads are a far cry from what we understand in America as modern highways; the logistics problems incident to a build-up operation, under such circumstances, are enormous.

We not only have the job of endeavoring to get troops there from Japan in as short a time as possible and rush them into the interior, but we also have to rush equipment and supplies in such volume as to enable them to fight an effective delaying action. In addition, and at the same time, we must get on with the task of bringing in the men, equipment, and supplies which would enable us to make a really firm stand at a selected line and in turn, when the situation allows, mount a counterattack.

Our military efforts in Korea were, in the early stages, handicapped by poor weather, which worked against continuous air attacks. The break in the air attacks allowed the North Koreans to make hasty but adequate repairs to bridges and roads in the interval when poor flying weather militated against the effectiveness of our air arm. The Air Force was also handicapped because the several more important airports fell into enemy hands almost at the outset.

The North Koreans, in contrast to the Republic of Korea's internal security forces, massed and trained and heavily equipped purely military forces. These included units which saw former service in conjunction with the Chinese Communist forces. They were veterans, seasoned in tactics, and trained to a specific, aggressive purpose. Their combat efficiency has weighed heavily against our limited forces.

Everything considered, and despite the actual reverses suffered by our forces to date, an outstanding performance has been given by those United States forces who have been committed to action. Of necessity, we were outnumbered, outfired in equipment, and harassed by fifth columnists turned snipers. Our forces were pressed into duty on unfamiliar terrain, with many natural hazards; in the face of strong, well-mounted, highly-trained and disciplined enemy forces. They have made the enemy pay a stiff price for his advances.

Now, as the symbol of the free world's determination to halt Communist aggression Korea is a testing ground of the will to freedom and survival—free of unprovoked international assault.

Then what is next?

To support more intensive action in Korea—and meet the threat of trouble elsewhere—it is becoming apparent that limited industrial mobilization will be necessary. Selective industrial mobilization probably could be carried out without great disruption; for example, television set manufacture could be diverted in favor of radar, and automobile production curtailed to furnish more tanks. The National Guard and the Reserves should be utilized in the conduct of the war.

It is even more important to take seriously the Korean lessons as they apply to defense planning. In addition to continued contribution to the defense of western Europe we must be prepared for other prompt police actions. For the Russians, unless they are stopped in Korea, can tie us down all over the world in a series of incidents without ever committing their own troops. To counter this we need not only the military support of other countries in the United Nations, but also a change in the composition of our forces. In other words, we need to have both better intelligence and the trained men, supplies, and transportation necessary to get into action quickly. To do these things we at home must accept the fact that we are in the struggle too—the men on the Korean front cannot do the job alone.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] is recognized for 10 minutes.

GORE FARM BILL

Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, I rise on the floor of the United States Congress to refute a falsification of the record—a falsification of the contents of the so-called Gore farm bill. Untrue statements have been widely published in paid advertisements in the course of a senatorial Democratic primary campaign in the State of Oklahoma. I arise to state the facts in order to protect my own record and the record of a great majority of this body, who, along with our able, distinguished, and beloved colleague, the Honorable MIKE MONRONEY, voted for passage of this farm bill which bore my name as author.

When the publication of these grossly unfair and untrue statements came to my attention, I wired the senior Member of the other legislative body at the other side of the Capitol, from the State of Oklahoma, advising him that these falsified advertisements had been published in support of his candidacy and that his own photograph had been used in these advertisements clearly implying his affirmation of the statements. I requested that the gentleman make correction of the misstatements by telling the truth about the bill or publicly disassociate his name therefrom. I also told the gentleman in my wire that unless he did so I would be compelled to set the record straight on the floor of Congress in order to protect my own record from being severely prejudiced. Thus far the gentleman has taken no such action. The canards have been left to stand; therefore, as I said a moment ago, I now rise on the floor of Congress to refute them.

In a bold and bald-faced manner, the advertisements describe the so-called Gore bill as providing price supports for farm commodities at only 60 percent of parity. Now that is utterly, completely, wholly, and deliberately untrue. These false advertisements have appeared in nearly all, if not all newspapers in the State of Oklahoma. It is apparent that this is done for the purpose of unjustly besmirching the record of one of the ablest and finest men ever to serve in the United States Congress, the Honorable MIKE MONRONEY. I say this is the purpose, because, in the advertisements, the gentleman from Oklahoma, Congressman MONRONEY, is charged with the heinous crime of supporting the Gore bill because, as the ads erroneously say, this was a 60 percent of parity bill. What is the truth? Well, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] did support the Gore bill, but it was not a 60 percent of parity bill. As a matter of fact, he made the ablest and most influential speech made for the bill. Of course, many of my colleagues here today remember that fine, eloquent argument he made. But, Mr. Speaker, he made no argument in favor of a 60 percent of parity price-support program. Not at all. It was in favor of continuing the existing 90 percent of parity price-support program that Representative MONRONEY spoke. In fact, MIKE MONRONEY never favored 60 percent of parity price support upon any commodity, except potatoes. I say this unreservedly because I know MIKE MONRONEY'S record. He and I took the oath of office together in the United States Congress. We soon became fast friends and we have been together in the thick of many, many legislative battles. I have followed him on many, many important decisions, and I will tell you now that I hold his judgment in highest esteem. I teamed with MIKE MONRONEY in the early days of World War II to increase the price-support program from 52 to 90 percent of parity on basic commodities. Our amendment was accepted. Moreover, our amendment provided price support for a large number of nonbasic commodities which had never before had the benefit of price support. MIKE MONRONEY thought this was right, and we know what a hard fighter MIKE MONRONEY is for what he thinks is right.

Yes; MIKE MONRONEY played a very important part in establishing the 90 percent of parity price-support program in the first instance; and, then last year, he made the strongest, the ablest, and the most effective speech in support of the Gore bill, which continued this 90-percent-of-parity price-support program. Why, then, should he, of all people, be charged with favoring a 60 percent of parity price-support program? Well, of course, it could be nothing but politics and the cheapest sort of politics at that. I call that hitting below the belt.

Of course, I do not have to speak for MIKE MONRONEY. He has already demonstrated that he can quite adequately take care of himself. But, I do feel the need to refute this falsification of the Gore bill, lest, by allowing these publicized falsehoods to go unanswered, other Members who voted for this bill, as well as myself, would be similarly attacked, and that is why I have risen today on the floor of Congress to set the record straight.

Now, I have said that MIKE MONRONEY made the most effective speech in favor of the Gore bill. He also made the most influential argument against the Brannan plan, and, mind you, Mr. Speaker, we offered the so-called Gore bill as a substitute for the so-called Pace-Brannan bill, which, as you know, embodied the principles and a large part of the objectionable features of the familiarly known Brannan plan. Yes, MIKE MONRONEY was not only in favor of continuing the 90 percent of parity price-support program, but he was very much against the regimentation and impracticability of the Brannan plan. I, too, was against the Brannan plan. Now, who was it who voted for the so-called Gore bill along with MIKE MONRONEY and myself? At least three-fourths of all Congressmen from the real farm districts, whether Democrat or Republican, voted for the Gore bill. That brings up another falsification in these ads. It is plainly said that my bill was supported by the big-city Congressmen. Well, I have looked up the record on that and I find that very, very few Members from any large city in the entire United States voted for the so-called Gore bill as a substitute for the Pace-Brannan bill. The facts are quite to the contrary and quite the reverse of these ads appearing in Oklahoma for the purpose of defaming and besmirching the record of a colleague of ours who is so loved and respected by the membership of this body.

Now, as I said a moment ago, I do not feel that MIKE MONRONEY needs me to rise on the floor of Congress to defend him. That, I am not doing. The results of the Oklahoma primary July 4 showed that MIKE MONRONEY can take care of himself in Oklahoma. But what about the rest of us who supported this sound farm program? Our records are prejudiced, too. I have a right and you have a right to have the record set straight. That is what I intend to do today.

Now, it just so happens that the same gentleman in whose behalf these false advertisements were published has within the last few days introduced a farm bill himself. What kind of bill is it? What is that farm bill? Is it the Brannan plan? Oh, no. He introduced that last year. Is he still for the Brannan plan? Well, that is not for me to answer. That is beside the point. What about the last bill that this gentleman introduced? It provides for an extension of the 90 percent of parity price support program. Now, that is exactly what MIKE MONRONEY and I did last year. If it was so wrong last year, why is it so right now? It is said that unless this is done now, the flexible price support program will go into effect next year. These flexible provisions of the law were not in the Gore bill which MIKE MONRONEY and I supported. Those provisions were added by the Agriculture Committee of another body which this same gentleman supposedly presided over as chairman prior to his departure for Sweden. If those provisions are so wrong now, why did the Agriculture Committee of the other body put them into the bill last year? If the provisions which MIKE MONRONEY and I supported in the Gore bill last year were so wrong then, why are they so right now? If the Brannan plan was right last year, why is it that the same gentleman who introduced the Brannan plan last year would now introduce a bill entirely unlike the Brannan plan? Well, the answer to these questions is obvious. The people who supported the so-called Gore bill last year are faring pretty well with the electorate, while many supporters of the Brannan plan are dodging the issue in every conceivable way.

What did the Gore bill provide? Here is what it provided. Here is the truth which I state in order that no one else will attempt such deception and falsification. Here are the facts. The Gore bill that passed the House last year provided for two things: First, the extension of the existing 90 percent of parity price support program; second, repeal of the Hope-Aiken law of sliding scale supports. It is under the provision of this so-called Gore bill, later becoming law, that prices of basic commodities and some others are today being supported at 90 percent of parity. It is not a perfect program but it is the product of years of experience and farmer cooperation and is basically sound.

SENATE

TUESDAY, JULY 18, 1950

(Legislative day of Saturday, July 1, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Rev. F. Norman Van Brunt, associate minister, Foundry Methodist Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thy name, O Thou Almighty and Everlasting God, for the inspiring struggle which is the story of Thy people to find the way to truth and light. For those who have held high the torch of truth in perilous times and have brought it through to triumph at great costs, we give Thee thanks. Now at the crossroads of history where decisions of mountainous proportions must be made, we pray for that stamina to stand in this hour. When the odds are high let us turn to Thee knowing that truth is rooted and grounded in Thy holy will. Thus, may we not falter, but, with great faith, go forward knowing that—

"Though the cause of evil prosper,
Yet 'tis truth alone is strong:
Though her portion be the scaffold,
And upon the throne be wrong;
Yet that scaffold sways the future,
And behind the dim unknown
Standeth God within the shadow
Keeping watch over His own."

Amen.

FEDERAL AID TO FISH RESTORATION AND MANAGEMENT, RESOLUTION OF WISCONSIN CONSERVATION CONGRESS, MOSINEE, WIS.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have in my hand a letter and a resolution received from the chairman of the Wisconsin Conservation Congress on the subject of support of H. R. 6533, the Dingell bill for Fishery Aid and Management. I absolutely agree with the sentiments expressed in the resolution and I am delighted to note that the Senate Commerce Committee has reported the bill to the Senate. The bill has already been approved by the House of Representatives.

H. R. 6533 is now pending on the Senate Calendar where I trust it will be coming up very promptly and passed by unanimous consent, to be thereafter submitted to the White House and this time I trust that the President will not veto it. I have every reason to feel that it will be enacted into public law at long last.

I believe that Mr. Hemp's letter explaining the background of the Wisconsin Conservation Congress will be of interest to my colleagues, and so I ask unanimous consent that the text of his message as well as the text of the resolution adopted by the executive council be printed in the RECORD, and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the letter and resolution were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXECUTIVE CONSERVATION COUNCIL OF THE WISCONSIN CONSERVATION CONGRESS,
Mosinee, Wis., July 14, 1950.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
United States Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: Attached you will find a copy of a resolution concerning the Dingell bill which was passed by the executive conservation council of the Wisconsin Conservation Congress at its meeting held in Madison, Wis., on July 6 and 7, 1950.

For your information I wish to point out that the Wisconsin Conservation Congress consists of 3 delegates from each of the 71 counties of the State of Wisconsin. These delegates are elected at public meetings held in each county, and at the same time hearings are held on game and fish regulations. The regulations are considered at the county meetings as they pertain to each particular county. The delegates elected are instructed to attend the State-wide session, known as the Wisconsin Conservation Congress, so that the regulations may be fitted to the State as a whole, thus making for uniformity and simplicity.

As chairman of the Wisconsin Conservation Congress, I respectfully submit this resolution for your information and consideration.

Very truly yours,

RICHARD A. HEMP,
Chairman, Wisconsin Conservation Congress.

Resolution

Whereas the passage of H. R. 6533 known as the Dingell bill is a matter of great concern to the conservationists of Wisconsin; and

Whereas H. R. 6533 has the unanimous approval of the conservationists of the State of Wisconsin; and

Whereas the failure to place this bill on the calendar of the Congress to date is viewed with grave concern and apprehension by the conservationists of Wisconsin: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Executive Council of the Wisconsin Conservation Congress, That the Wisconsin delegation in the House of Representatives and the Senate be urged to put forth every effort to bring this bill on the floor of the Congress during the current session and to diligently work for its enactment; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States and to every Wisconsin Member of the House of Representatives and the Senate.

LARRY C. WHIFFINS,
Chairman, Resolutions Committee.

This resolution was adopted unanimously by the Executive Council of the Wisconsin Conservation Congress July 7, 1950.

AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH AND MARKETING ACTIVITIES—LETTER FROM WISCONSIN COUNCIL OF AGRICULTURE COOPERATIVE, MADISON, WIS.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, one of the most vital pieces of legislation which we have enacted was the Research and Marketing Act of 1946 under which Uncle Sam, in cooperation with the States, performs this vital service for the benefit of farmers and ultimately the consumers of our Nation. It has been my pleasure to act to safeguard the adequate handling of this act by various appropriation bills since then. I yield to no man in my desire for Federal economy, but as I have often pointed out, economy is not a matter to be performed with a meat ax which will wipe out essential as well as nonessential services.

I have in my hand a letter received from a dear friend and distinguished expert, Milo K. Swanton, executive secretary of the Wisconsin Council of Agriculture Cooperative.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of Mr. Swanton's appeal for sufficient funds for marketing services be printed at this point in the RECORD, and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WISCONSIN COUNCIL OF AGRICULTURE COOPERATIVE,
Madison, Wis., July 13, 1950.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: We have been informed that the House has reduced the funds to the Department of Agriculture for the Research and Marketing Act of 1946. This 10-percent reduction would jeopardize the research in marketing activities.

We have always felt that a man's judgment is no better than his information and research information is of vital importance and concern to the farmers in Wisconsin.

Our State department of agriculture has been using these funds and a duplicating amount from the State to carry on market information service activities.

Because of the importance of these funds to Wisconsin agriculture, we urge you to do all in your power to restore the full amount. Your support in this matter is solicited by the Wisconsin Council of Agriculture Cooperative.

Sincerely yours,

MILO K. SWANTON,
Executive Secretary.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE HOOVER COMMISSION—STATEMENT BY SENATOR McCLELLAN

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement released by me to the press yesterday as chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments announcing that the committee expected to complete action on all proposals effectuating recommendations of the Hoover Commission referred to the committee.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR McCLELLAN

Senator JOHN L. McCLELLAN, chairman of the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, announced today that the committee expected to complete action on all proposals effectuating recommendations of the Hoover Commission referred to the committee, in order to permit action to be taken before adjournment of the Congress.

An executive session of the committee has been set for Thursday, July 20, at which time it is expected action will be taken with reference to reporting out bills dealing with records management improvement in the General Services Administration (S. 3842), and with the bonding of Federal employees (H. R. 8706), the only remaining legislation carrying out Hoover Commission recommendations pending before the committee.

The original bill establishing the General Services Administration was approved by the committee in June 1949 (Public Law No. 152). The Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report, in recognition of the first anniversary of its enactment, recently stated that: "The new General Services Administration, created from scattered agencies previously existing, already has developed great efficiency in what the Hoover Commission called the 'housekeeping' functions of the Government. Substantial savings are assured as a result of the integration and reorganization of various activities in line with the Hoover Commission recommendations." The pending bill would extend the records and buildings management authority of the Administrator of GSA, and includes amendments which Senator McCLELLAN stated would, in his opinion, permit the Administrator to place the GSA on the most efficient administrative level of any agency in the entire Federal Government.

S. 3842 is endorsed by the General Accounting Office, the Budget Director, and the General Services Administrator. Mr. Emmett J. Leahy, Executive Director of the National Records Management Council, New York, who was Director of the Hoover Commission Task Force on Records Management and author of its report, wrote the chairman of the committee on July 14, as follows:

"I have carefully reviewed S. 3842 and compared it with the letter and spirit of our recommendations for the Hoover Commission. It is gratifying to find that your bill is wholly consistent with our recommendations.

"You and your colleagues on the committee are to be commended by all records management specialists, your constituents, and the general public for the excellent progress you have made toward slashing red tape and clerical costs in the Federal Government. At the same time, you are insuring greater effectiveness of records as tools of Federal management and service.

"It is significant that your action promises to forge the Federal Government far ahead of both private business and State and local governments in the improvement and reduction of clerical operations including record making and record keeping.

"We trust that you and your colleagues will not relent in your efforts to achieve these excellent objectives during the present session of Congress."

When final disposition has been made of this bill and measures relating to the improvement of the fidelity bonding system of Government employees presently being studied by a subcommittee headed by Senator HOEY, the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments will have completed action on all matters pertaining to Hoover Commission recommendations which have been referred to it.

In addition to these measures on which Senate action will be sought, the committee has reported favorably S. 3850, the Budget and Accounting Procedures Act of 1950, and S. 3653, a bill providing for reorganization of the financing operations of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, Department of the Treasury, setting up a business-type budget and revolving fund method of financing for the operations of the Bureau, implementing Hoover Commission recommendations in its report on Budgeting and Accounting; and S. 3147, establishing a National Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, recommended by the Commission in its report on Federal-State Relations, which are now pending on the Senate Calendar.

During the Eighty-first Congress, 34 reorganization plans were referred to the committee. A thirty-fifth plan (No. 8 of 1949, for the reorganization of the National Military Establishment), was incorporated in Public Law 216. Two of the 34 plans referred to the committee were duplicating in overall purposes, No. 1 of 1949, and No. 27 of 1950, elevating the Federal Security Agency to Cabinet status; and No. 1 of 1950, and No. 26 of 1950, effecting reorganizations within the Department of the Treasury. The first two of these plans were rejected; and one (No. 26) will become effective on July 31, objections to the original plan (No. 1) having been removed.

The other five plans rejected (in addition to No. 1 of 1949, No. 27 of 1950, and No. 1 of 1950) were reorganizations in the Department of Agriculture (No. 4 of 1950), Interstate Commerce Commission (No. 7 of 1950), and Federal Communications Commission (No. 11 of 1950), the abolition of the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board (No. 12 of 1950), and the transfer of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Department of Commerce (No. 24 of 1950). The net result is that in all, six of the total of 34 specific reorganization proposals, involving eight actions, were rejected by the Congress.

The committee will release, soon after the end of the session, a complete résumé of actions taken by the Eighty-first Congress in the implementation of recommendations of the Hoover Commission to supplement previous reports prepared by the committee (S. Rept. No. 1158 and No. 1774), including administrative actions.

THIRTY-THIRD SESSION OF INTERNATIONAL LABOR CONFERENCE AT GENEVA, SWITZERLAND—STATEMENT BY SENATOR O'CONOR

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, recently I had the pleasure of participating in the International Labor Conference held at Geneva. The report of the United States delegates has been filed for the information of the Senate, and I ask unanimous consent that a statement prepared by me covering the report be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR HERBERT R. O'CONOR COVERING REPORT TO UNITED STATES SENATE ON THIRTY-THIRD SESSION OF INTERNATIONAL LABOR CONFERENCE AT GENEVA, SWITZERLAND, JUNE 7–JULY 1, 1950

It is a welcome pleasure again to report to the Senate on the accomplishments of a session of the International Labor Conference. At the 1950 ILO Conference I had the honor of representing the United States as one of its two Government delegates. The other Government delegate was the Honorable Philip M. Kaiser, Assistant Secretary of Labor. The United States employers' delegate was Mr. C. P. McCormick, of McCormick & Co., Baltimore Md., and the workers' delegate, Mr. Philip Delaney, of the American Federation of Labor. Congressman AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Arnold Zempel, of the Department of Labor, were alternate Government delegates. In addition, there were advisers to each of the Government, employer, and worker delegates.

All members of the United States delegation took an active part in the session of the Conference which took place in Geneva, Switzerland, from June 7 through July 1. Mr. McCormick was highly honored by election as one of the three vice presidents of the Conference. The successful work of the entire delegation reflected credit upon the United States.

The International Labor Organization is a specialized agency of the United Nations and is unique among international organizations because of its tripartite membership, its delegations being composed of representatives of governments, employers, and workers. Its function is to study and to undertake action on the international level to elevate labor standards and improve living conditions of workers throughout the world, through measures developed in cooperation by all three groups.

Fifty-two countries were represented at the recent session of the Conference, including two newly elected members—the Republic of the United States of Indonesia and Viet-Nam. In addition, there were a number of observers—for the Allied High Commission for Germany and the supreme commander for the Allied Powers in Japan, as well as for the Western German Federal Republic and for Japan. The Conference was particularly happy to welcome the representatives of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, General Secretary Oldenbroek, of the Netherlands, and Mr. Alfred Braunthal, of the United States, the chief of its economic and social department. This is the first general Conference of the ILO which it has been possible for representatives of the ICFTU to attend since its organization in London last November. This new free trade-union organization is launching an aggressive constructive world-wide anti-Communist program. It is significant that all segments of American labor are affiliated with this international democratic federation.

In view of the troubled state of the world at this time, it was inevitable that this session of the International Labor Conference should have been disturbed by matters having to do with international politics which are outside its scope. Just after the nomination of Mr. Jagjivan Ram, Minister of Labor for India, as president of this session, the government delegates of Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary challenged the seating of representatives from the Chinese Republic, insisting that the Conference should immediately decide that the representatives of the Communist government should be seated instead.

The temporary president of the Conference, Mr. Troclet, of Belgium, ruled that this protest should be referred to the credentials committee. The delegations of Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary thereupon promptly withdrew from the Conference. Mr. Philip M. Kaiser, Assistant Secretary of Labor in the United States Department of Labor, rose immediately thereafter to second the nomination of Mr. Ram as president of the Conference and pointed out very forcefully that the withdrawal of the Czechoslovak, Hungarian, and Polish Governments "obviously contradicts the claim of these governments that they are interested in solving the grave economic and social problems, of primary concern to working men and women, which beset the world today."

The credentials committee recommended that the Conference should take note that under the circumstances, with two governments continuing to contend for authority in China, the only possible solution for the difficulties which had arisen was to recognize that the government of the Chinese Republic had validly nominated representatives of that country to the present session of the Conference. The report of the credentials committee on this subject was accepted by the Conference without discussion.

Toward the end of the session we were all shocked by the news of the invasion of South Korea by armies from the Communist North. There was, of course, no reason for the International Labor Organization to take formal action on this violation of international peace, but I believe the whole United States delegation was very much heartened by the enthusiastic spontaneous reaction of the delegates toward President Truman's prompt support of the resolution of the Security Council of the United Nations to preserve the peace by providing military assistance to South Korea.

The program of the Conference proceeded efficiently and a great deal was accomplished. Much credit is due to the excellent work of the staff of the International Labor Office. Prominent on the agenda were discussions of methods of increasing productivity and of maintaining full employment. These two subjects had been stressed in the comprehensive annual report of Mr. David A. Morse, formerly Under Secretary of Labor in our own country, and now the Director General of the International Labor Office.

In my formal statement on the Director General's report I was happy to inform the Conference of the improvement of the employment situation in the United States since June 1949 and of the extent to which increases in productivity in the United States have been associated with increases in the goods and wages actually available to working men and women and their families in this country. We have found in discussions with many of the delegates and their advisers from other countries that they still fear that increases in productivity per man-hour would not result in any gains to the workers in terms of higher wages and lower prices, and that one outgrowth would be increases in unemployment.

It was possible to demonstrate that our experience has been that real wages have risen as output per man-hour has gone up, that the work week has become shorter, and that the worker's job has become less burdensome and safer because the newer types of machinery are not only more productive but safer to use. In expressing the hope that the ILO may play an important part in raising labor productivity in countries where its assistance is needed, I suggested assistance from governments to develop vocational training programs, efficient organization of the labor market, and studies of job standardization and simplification.

Later in the Conference, our Secretary of Labor, Maurice J. Tobin, gave the delegates an account of the measures which were used in our country during 1949 and early 1950 to counteract the recession in employment which came about as a result of postwar inventory adjustments. Secretary Tobin also stressed the desire of the people of the United States for peace throughout the world, and our willingness as demonstrated by the Marshall plan and the point 4 program to make sacrifices to maintain peace. Secretary Tobin's visit strengthened immeasurably the position and influence of the United States in the ILO.

The discussion of unemployment problems in reply to the questions raised in the report of the Director General of the International Labor Office was followed by the adoption of a resolution on the subject by the Conference. This resolution draws the attention of the United Nations, the specialized agencies governments, and employers and workers' organizations to the types of action which the Conference considers should be vigorously pursued for the purpose of eliminating the evil of unemployment. It urges governments to maintain, or to establish as rapidly as national conditions allow, unemployment benefits and allowances; to take action to produce economic and social conditions conducive to full employment through employment services, as well as measures to promote mobility of labor, to train and retrain workers, to improve recruitment policies, and to encourage investments in depressed areas from which it might be undesirable to move workers.

Another new labor standard adopted in final form in this session was a recommendation concerning vocational training of adults, including disabled persons. Mr. Ansel Cleary of the Bureau of Apprenticeship of the United States Department of Labor acted as chairman of the committee which developed the final draft of this recommendation. The expansion of vocational training programs is of enormous importance in many countries of the world where the consumption level of the workers is low not only because of lack of capital equipment, but also because of shortage of skilled workers. Uneducated and inefficient workers are very frequently dissatisfied workers, and I am sure that this new standard will be of great aid to persons working on technical assistance programs in cooperation with governments wishing to aid their workers to reach higher levels of skill.

In addition there were also discussions of a proposed Convention and recommendation concerning minimum-wage fixing in agriculture; a proposed recommendation concerning collective agreements, and a Convention and/or recommendation regarding equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value.

When adopted, the Convention and recommendation concerning minimum-wage fixing in agriculture will set standards concerning minimum-wage-fixing machinery in agriculture for governments wishing to set up such machinery.

The proposed recommendation concerning collective agreements covers types of machinery to be established by governments wishing to set up such machinery on collective bargaining, voluntary conciliation, and voluntary arbitration.

The committee on international standards in regard to equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value, of which Miss Frieda Miller, Chief of the Women's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor, acted as reported, held for further decision the question of whether the international standard should take the form of a convention or a recommendation until the final discussion of the standards at the 1951 session.

The conclusions reached will be forwarded to governments for comment and new drafts will be prepared on the basis of these comments for consideration by the 1951 session where final agreement will be reached.

There was considerable discussion at this conference of the Fact-Finding Commission on Freedom of Association. The governing body, the ILO Conference, and the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations may refer to the Commission for impartial examination, allegations of infringement of trade-union rights. No complaint will be referred to the Commission without the consent of the government concerned. The Commission will report to the governing body on the results of its work and it will be for the governing body to consider in the first instance what action should be taken on the basis of the report.

I want to assure the members of the Senate of my renewed conviction of the value of the work of the International Labor Organization. In bringing together workers, employers, and governments from so many nations, it provides an opportunity for cooperative effort regarding one of the world's most important problems—that of finding democratic solutions for ignorance, inefficiency, and poverty as they affect workers in industry and agriculture. It is my firm belief that we cannot relax for one moment our efforts on this front. I undertook to give positive assurance to the members of the conference in Geneva that in seeking through the ILO to bring about major improvements in working and living conditions of millions and millions of workers throughout the world, we are advancing along the surest course to world peace.

Russia is seizing every opportunity to thwart the efforts of liberty-loving nations to advance toward the goal of world peace. Further, the Kremlin is deliberately selecting certain groups of human beings for their propaganda of false promises in furthering Communist expansion.

This was plainly evident at the recent General Conference (of International Labor Organization). All of the delegates with whom I conferred at the conference were well aware of the fact that workers are a prime target for Communist infiltration. More than this, the majority of the representatives attending seemed to understand that Communist tactics call for the exploitation of legitimate as well as unfounded worker grievances for their own nefarious political objectives. In view of this, everyone at the conference recognized the tremendous significance of the activities of the International Labor Organization.

As the satellite delegates were staging their walkout in protest against the participation of Nationalist China at Geneva, the United States delegation, together with the representatives from the other democratic nations, threw their wholehearted support behind the activities of the ILO. They recognize that its activities, designed as they are to raise the working and living standards of men and women throughout the world, can make and actually are making a tremendous contribution toward eliminating the causes of unrest and despair which, as we all know, are fertile breeding grounds for communism. It is no surprise that the Soviet Union is continually attacking the ILO.

The Senate will be interested to know that the entire United States delegation—employer, worker, and Government representatives—to this thirty-third International Labor Conference, was 100 percent united in matters of basic principles such as these. There were disagreements as to details, but we presented a united front on our fundamental objectives to the other nations of the world. We used the opportunity afforded by this conference of the Government, employer, and worker representatives of the world to demonstrate by word and deed that the underlying basis of American success is in the ever-expanding area of cooperation between government, management, and labor for solution of the human problems of twentieth century industrial living.

For this reason, if for no other, the International Labor Organization (except for the United Nations itself), is in my opinion probably the most significant international organization in which we hold membership. I consider it a rare privilege to have been nominated by the President to serve on the United States delegation.

DIVISION OF WATERS OF WATERTON AND BELLY RIVERS BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, the international Joint Commission recently concluded field hearings at Shelby and Havre, Mont., on the proper division, between the people of the United States and Canada, of the waters of the Waterton and Belly Rivers, which originate in Glacier National Park, in Montana, and flow across the international border into Canada.

The Honorable R. V. Bottomly, associate justice of the Montana Supreme Court, has written letters to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] and to me which contain factual information bearing on this important question, and which constitute a real contribution to an equitable solution of the problem.

I ask unanimous consent that Justice Bottomly's communications on this vitally important subject be printed in the RECORD for the information of the Senate.

There being no objection, the communications from Justice Bottomly were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF MONTANA,
SUPREME COURT,
Helena, June 1, 1950.

Re Waterton-Belly Rivers.

Hon. JAMES E. MURRAY,
United States Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR JIM: As you know, I have been working for over 2 years on the matter of getting a reference before the International Commission, American-Canadian Border, for a division and settlement of the waters of the Waterton-Belly Rivers.

These two rivers originate in Glacier National Park, in Montana, flow north between two ranges across the international border into Canada. The approximate flow is 400,000 acre-feet. If all this flow could be put on land for irrigation it would mean that it would cover 400,000 acres 1 foot deep. About 1 to 2 inches is all that is needed for irrigation for row crops, but three to five applications are needed during the growing season.

Now the Canadians started some 3 years ago to get going on putting this water on their land. They are now engaged in building a dam on the Belly. They have a canal surveyed to bring the water of the Waterton into the Belly above said dam. Then they will divert the water as far east through Alberta into Saskatchewan. Their Canadian Government has entered into the picture and has authorized expenditures for the whole project.

Our Reclamation Bureau has made some surveys—the idea is to make a treaty with Canada. Then the Bureau, if authorized, would build a high dam on the Belly with Canada and store all this water, then divert our equitable share through a natural sag or draw, a gravity flow canal into Montana about where Sweet Grass is, then take the water both east and west from there onto the land. Mr. Sloan has said this is the most feasible program.

I do not need to elaborate to you what an asset 200,000 acres of irrigated land would mean to Montana and the Nation in raising food and livestock. I am enclosing a copy of an editorial and news articles on that feature.

Either Canada gets this forever and our acres parch forever or we get an equitable share and we have a producing asset forever.

This matter has been before the International Commission for over a year. It has been charged by some that the Canadians are arbitrary in this matter; that they are dragging their feet and won't agree to anything, hoping to delay the matter without action until they get this water on their land—then it would be practically impossible for the United States to ever get a drop.

I don't think, at least I hope, that this is not the attitude of the Canadians. We have always had the most friendly relations with the Canadians, and I am confident that when we make this matter clear to them they will be fair to us, and the good-neighbor relations between our State and the Canadians across the border will continue as they have in the past.

The Commission is holding two meetings in Montana in June, at Shelby June 12, then at Havre June 17, and two meetings at Canadian points. It is to be hoped that we may be able to work out this problem with our Canadian friends in a spirit of justice and fair play.

The other alternative for us to get this water is to drill an all-American tunnel through the mountains and also build a dam across Waterton Lake along the boundary line and bring the water to our parched land, but this is a very expensive proposition. Nevertheless, it is well known that we do not stop at expense when we recognize that a program is indispensable to the protection of our rights. A bill has been introduced in Congress to drill this tunnel, but I think we should delay action on that measure while we undertake to convince the Canadians of the justice of our position. If the Canadians act fairly in this matter, it will avoid a heavy expense on us which we would have to bear in order to protect our interests.

As you can see, Jim, time is of the essence, and a determination should be made soon if we expect any water. You know Mr. Valance, an attorney in the State Department who handles these matters, is here now gathering information and arranging for the meetings. He is keen and alert to the situation. I hope you can contact him upon his return to Washington after these hearings. I told him that the time had come to act firmly in this matter and let our neighbors across the border understand that we intend to insist on a fair division of this water, and that unless they acquiesce we will be compelled to take such action as is necessary to protect our interests.

I think some speeches should be made in both the House and Senate, explaining this situation in detail so that the public may understand the problem. I have written Senator LANGER as his State is interested in controlling the Red River, another border stream. All these questions clear across the country along the border should be handled together as one problem, not piecemeal. Am enclosing copy of my letter to him.

Thank you to give attention to this, Jim, as it appears to me to be not only an international question but one of the biggest matters for the good of Montana in particular and for the country as a whole.

Sincerely yours,

R. V. BOTTOMLY.

MAY 27, 1950.

Re Tidelands and Waterton and Belly Rivers.

Hon. WILLIAM LANGER,
United States Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR LANGER: I am writing to you as I know you always recognize the equities in a case. You may not know but I was one of three attorneys general of the States who fought in every way I could the so-called tidelands steal, which you had a lot to do with in helping to defeat and in sustaining the President's veto. I notice you will again have the matter before you.

Two years ago while I was attorney general I prepared a brief on the subject and, thinking it might be of some use to you, I am enclosing a copy. I have just recently had a letter from Harold Ickes, to whom I had submitted a copy and asked him, if, as an administrator, he thought that my analysis was valid and correct as to the bill now in Congress. He answered, stating that it was as valid today as when written, in his opinion. I would like your reaction to my brief at your convenience.

Now as to the Belly-Waterton Rivers: These rivers arise in Glacier National Park, Mont., flow north into Canada between two ranges, and fed by the perpetual snows, glaciers, and rains, they flow into Canada at the crossing of the international boundary. There is a flow of approximately 400,000 acre-feet.

Montana has hundreds of thousands of acres of arid land, superior soils, just east of the Rocky Mountain range, which with this water would be converted into a perpetual, highly productive garden, producing row crops, fibers, alfalfa, and feed crops for livestock for all time to come.

The Bureau of Reclamation has reported that by building a high dam on the Waterton near Lethbridge, Alberta, diverting the Belly into the Waterton by short canal, the equitable share flowing from the United States could be diverted back into the United States by gravity through a natural depression at a very economical figure.

The other alternative is to drive a tunnel through the mountains and bring the water onto the lands, but at a very high cost. This matter is now before the International Commission for adjustment but the Canadians are arbitrary and are working feverishly to perfect an irrigation works, construct dams, and divert and put all this water on their lands before a decision can be reached through the Commission. The Commissioners are holding two hearings on this matter in Montana, one at Shelby, June 12, and one at Havre, June 17, and two in Canada.

Mr. Valance, attorney for the United States Department in Charge of United States-Canada Border Problems, is now here. I have known him for years. He is keen and knows the works.

I have been working for over 2 years on this matter. The magnitude of this problem is set forth in an enclosed editorial and article.

The reason I am writing is that time is of the essence herein. We don't want to lose this water which is a great national asset as well as a great benefit to Montana, as the editorial sets forth.

Now the Red River in Canada and your State needs controlling. From this side of the international line there isn't much that this country can do, but our Government could participate with Canada in building dams or other works to arrest the flood menace and as a part of the consideration Canada should consent to an equitable division of our Waterton-Belly waters. In other words, it is my theory that all waters of the international border should be considered as one problem clear across the board by the International Commission, instead of piecemeal and dealing with each matter separately.

The Canadians have been very arbitrary in this matter, bluntly telling the United States that if we think we can get this water go ahead and take it. They know the only way we can take it is by tunneling through the mountains. The cost would be terrific unless figured on a hundred-year basis. But with their consent we could, if the Senate approved by treaty, assist in building the high dam near Lethbridge and divert the water to our lands with very moderate expense.

Mr. Valance will return to Washington after these hearings, and I hope you can get together and go over this matter, as both projects are of utmost importance to the States concerned and to the United States also. This has been written hurriedly; hope you get my idea. I am also writing our Senator, JAMES E. MURRAY.

Sincerely yours,

R. V. BOTTOMLY.

JOHN J. MUCCIO, UNITED STATES AMBASSADOR TO KOREA

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, I desire to have printed in the RECORD a release which the Secretary of State has authorized of a telegram sent by him, by direction of the President, to the Honorable John J. Muccio, United States Ambassador to the Republic of Korea. It gives me a special pleasure to ask for this insertion in the RECORD because of the fact that Ambassador Muccio is a personal friend of mine and a fellow Rhode Islander.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
July 13, 1950.

Secretary of State Dean Acheson has sent the following message to the Honorable John J. Muccio, United States Ambassador to the Republic of Korea:

"The President has asked me to extend to you and to your staff his appreciation and commendation for your courageous and effective performance of duty since the onset of the present emergency in Korea.

"Your prompt and accurate reporting of the situation, the dispatch and efficiency with which you carried out the evacuation of the many American citizens for whom you were responsible, and the confidence which you have inspired in the face of the unprovoked aggression against Korea are in the finest tradition of the Foreign Service."

ORDER FOR RECESS

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate finishes its business today it stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SUGGESTED 10-PERCENT ADDITION TO TAXES FOR MILITARY PURPOSES

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes to make a suggestion concerning the war effort.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, the threat of becoming involved in a world war is now greater than the threat that confronted us in 1940. In that year the Congress authorized an expansion of our Military Establishment, provided for a draft of manpower, and passed a special tax bill to help finance that preparedness program.

That tax bill, which I helped frame, provided that commencing the first of the following calendar year and continuing for a period of 5 years all taxpayers should add 10 percent to their tax bills and that the funds so created should be placed in a special trust fund to be used exclusively for military purposes.

In this emergency I suggest reenactment of that law to become effective January 1, 1951, but exempting this time all excise taxes since they are still at the full war rate. Such a tax, applied only to personal and corporate income would raise in special defense money approximately $2,000,000,000 a year at the current rate of national income. It would not be retroactive on anyone because provision could be made for those reporting on a fiscal year basis to apply the increase only to that portion earned in calendar 1951.

At the present time the top effective personal income rate is 82 percent, but the 10-percent increase would not fall as heavily on those in the top brackets as might appear at first glance because of the law passed several years ago to permit husband and wife to divide the family income. That provision gave substantial tax relief to married persons with joint incomes up to $400,000. For those in that category the present top effective rate of 82 percent applies only to that portion of income above $200,000 and the additional 10 percent would not be a 10-percent addition to the rate, but merely 10 percent of the computed tax liability.

I have received letters and have read editorials in the Virginia newspapers indicating that Congress should act promptly to put the Nation on a full war footing. In my opinion, such a step is not now required, and would be calculated to do more harm than good. It was difficult enough to make OPA work during World War II. It was impossible to make it work a year after the war ended. There is an abundance of food, of clothing, and of many other consumer items, and no occasion to ration their distribution. It might be wise to give the President stand-by powers to allocate steel, which is so essential to the war effort, although I am confident that it can be accomplished by a voluntary agreement. It might be advisable to give the Federal Reserve Board stand-by powers to control consumer credit, which now is at an all-time high; but that likewise, to a large extent, could be accomplished by voluntary cooperation between banks and the merchants whose commercial paper they handle.

Undoubtedly, the best and safest way to control the issuance of too much new money through deficit financing and the inflationary pressure of that new money is to absorb at least a part of it through taxation. Aside from that desirable result, it will be inviting ultimate financial disaster if we run the national debt to such large proportions that confidence will be lost in Government bonds. In the budget now pending, there is a potential deficit of four or five billion dollars; and that budget carries no appropriation for more than $5,000,000,000 of E bonds or savings bonds which will mature next year, the assumption being that those now holding those bonds will buy new ones. Should that assumption not materialize, a terrific strain would be placed upon the commercial bond market in refinancing that obligation.

Although the time may come when we shall be forced to put our entire economy on a war footing, the first step in that direction undoubtedly is taxes; and many patriotic citizens will gladly pay additional taxes if the law imposing them provides that they shall be sequestered for military purposes only, and not made available for unnecessary domestic spending.

GENERAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1951

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7786) making appropriations for the support of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now before the Senate is on agreeing to the amendment, which was passed over yesterday, in the Department of Agriculture section of the appropriation bill, on page 221, beginning in line 19.

ENDING THE COLD WAR—IV

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, for many weeks past I have addressed the Senate on the subject of winning and ending the cold war. The cold war has now become a hot one, which is the way in which we had every reason to believe the cold war would end, in view of the fact that we never fought it with intelligence and energy. Had we done so, the Politburo would have been weaker at home than it is now, and the free world would have been stronger in this emergency than it now shows itself to be.

We have ahead of us the long, grinding months of making up, by the expenditure of billions of dollars and how many lives we cannot estimate, for the lack of engaging the enemy on the field where he was deployed—the field of the minds and loyalties of men.

In concluding this series of observations I wish to refer briefly to two recent opportunities for successful engagement with the enemy from which some advantage may yet be salvaged, although the full advantage of the opportunity has been lost.

Let me first call attention to the semihumorous but deadly serious charge of strewing potato bugs over the farms of eastern Germany, which charge, being practically uncontested, was later enlarged to include Czechoslovakia as well. I referred to this in a hearing on Senate Resolution 243 before the Foreign Relations Committee. I said:

> Why should not this accusation bring from us an offer to donate free of charge X tons of DDT to the potato growers of East Prussia? This chemical not only killed the bugs in Aroostook County, Maine, but it likewise destroyed other parasites and hindered the spread of most diseases the potato plant is afflicted with.
> We have nothing but good wishes and good will for the people of east Germany. Why not express it in this light-hearted and practical way. Undertakings of this sort should be part and parcel of the measures to be undertaken under Senate Resolution 243.

The serious and dangerous undertone to this silly accusation should be clear to all. Potato bugs and disease germs are too closely parallel to be ignored. To have let the accusation go with a simple denial, and without taking advantage of the possibilities for human appeal in the thing, leads us one step further toward new savageries in modern warfare. But there is still another lost battle of even greater significance.

Mr. President, I refer to a serious and effective offensive on the battlefield of ideas which was launched at the so-called World Peace Congress in Stockholm on March 15–19, 1950, held under the chairmanship of Frederic Joliot-Curie, the French Nobel prize winner. For the record, the American attendance at this so-called Peace Congress should be noted. The delegates were Mr. J. Rogge, former Assistant Attorney General of the United States and a vice chairman of the conference; the artist Rockwell Kent; the writer Albert Kahn; and Mr. Johannes Steel, vice president of the Progressive Party.

The ingeniousness of the work done by this Peace Congress is to be found in the wording of the manifesto which they produced. I quote:

> We demand the unconditional prohibition of the atomic weapon as a weapon of intimidation and mass extermination of people.
> We demand the establishment of strict international control over the implementation of this decision.
>
> We consider that the government which first uses the atomic weapon against any other country will commit a crime against humanity and shall be regarded as a war criminal.
> We call upon all people of good will all over the world to sign this appeal.

Why should not such a manifesto appeal to people all over the world, and why should not millions and millions of people attach their signatures to it?

Mr. President, it was calculated some little time ago that something over 130,000,000 signatures have been attached to this manifesto. Since that time other millions have signed. A news item shortly before the invasion of South Korea indicated that one and one-half million had signed north of the thirty-eighth parallel. The Russians know how to devise a good idea, spread it, broadcast, and make it effective. We do not. As a result, millions of people behind the iron curtain and in the missionary areas where Communist propaganda is at work are led to class Russia as being a peace-loving country, and the United States becomes more firmly settled than ever in the popular mind as being the world's warmonger.

But now let us see where we can get hold of this Russian declaration whose possibilities we could turn to the advantage of the free world. The second paragraph of the manifesto reads:

> We demand the establishment of strict international control over the implementation of this decision.

Is not this an acceptance of the United Nations plan?

Mr. President, let us take them up. Let us take them up. Let us take them up. Is not that exactly what we have been asking for? Talk about folly—how can we have the folly to allow these millions of signatures to be attached to a petition for doing what we have been trying to pursuade the Russians to do from the very start of our negotiations over the use of the atomic bomb? What is the matter with us? Are we thinking about something else than war or peace? Have we gone into senile decay?

It is not too late now for the State Department, by world-wide broadcast and direct diplomatic action, to take Russia up on her new and our old proposal for the control of the A-bomb.

Mr. President, we wait to see whether that Department remains a dangerous liability or charts for us a new course of effective service to our national interest and to the safety of the free nations of the globe.

So much for opportunities whose full possibilities have been missed but from which some advantage to the free world may still be drawn. In concluding, Mr. President, I wish to refer to earlier proposals of mine which become more timely, more necessary, now that the cold war has reached the boiling point.

Let me first refer to a highly significant piece of information. A friend of mine has in his employ on his farm, a family of Latvian DP's. Their history is incredible. The family itself escaped to Western Germany some little time ago. The father, months before, had been seized and taken to a work camp in far Siberia. From that work camp he escaped and made his way mostly on foot over the thousands of miles of Russia, Poland, and eastern Germany until he crossed the border into Western Germany and rejoined his family. In all those thousands of miles he sought and obtained nightly food and shelter wherever he might chance to find himself. In province after province of Russia itself as well as in Poland and eastern Germany he found everywhere families and farm folk who were willing to give shelter and aid to a fugitive.

What a story this is. It means that all along these weary miles there was no one so convinced of the virtues of the Politburo that it was felt to be a duty to give up a fugitive to the authorities. Only a strong sense of hostility to the existing Russian Government could have persuaded these hundreds of citizens to have risked reprisals and punishment in giving that shelter. Is not this one story, this single incident, and eye-opener as to the mental and spiritual background of the people against which the Russian Government has to operate within its own territories?

Another evidence is to be found in the great numbers of political prisoners which that government has found it necessary to put away from normal living. Reliable estimates have put these numbers at 9,000,000, excluding women and criminals. When we consider that the total adult male population—between the ages of 18 and 55—is somewhere around 90,000,000, we come up with the astonishing figure that about 15 percent of those adult males are in prison camps. Does that indicate that the Russian people are solidly behind the Russian Government?

If it was advisable to get in touch with the Russian people by the Voice of America and by other means while the cold war was still on, it is a thousand times more advisable now, when our only hope of getting out of this thing without great loss of treasure, lives, and liberties lies in giving the Politburo so much trouble at home as to seriously limit their ability to foment trouble abroad.

From now on the Voice of America must direct itself narrowly and sharply to the present emergency. It must go on the spiritual offensive. It must tell the Russian people that whereas the Western World has been giving freedom to its colonies and conquered peoples, we see their Government rolling over nation after nation, never daring to trust its cause to the choice of the people, but always capturing territory by subversive minorities and force of arms. Against this, in its latest and most flagrant form, the invasion of South Korea, the free world has had to rise in defense of free men everywhere.

The second point which must be hammered home is that there does not exist in the free world, any group anywhere which has anything but friendly feeling for the Russian people. Nowhere is there to be found a nation or a political party or any important individuals who want anything which the Russian people have. What we want for them is the blessings of freedom which we have been enjoying and of which their Government has deprived them and of which it now seeks to deprive the whole world.

We are friends of the Russian people. The insane lust for conquest which possesses their Government is going to impose on the Russian people new hardships, new dangers, new deprivation of the good things of life and of spiritual freedom. Their only enemy is their own Government.

Hitler knew and the Politburo knows how to affect the minds and hearts of men. They did it by the simple telling of simple lies over and over and over again. We can do as much. Rather, we can do more by adopting their technique but with a different message. We can tell the truth in simple, understandable, and straightforward terms over and over and over and over again. The time has come for that.

On this floor in the months past I have from time to time suggested the use of such unconventional means of reaching the Russian people as the employment of free balloons dropping messages of good will over the thousands of square miles of Russian territory. These messages will not lie rotting in the fields and streets. They will be passed from hand to hand. They likewise should be simple, primarily pictorial, and reiterate in varying form but with unvarying persistence the fact that we of the Western World have a common cause with the people of Russia. We are not against them. We are for them. Their hope for the future lies in our success. Our failure condemns them to permanent slavery.

Mr. President, when I have made this suggestion in times past it has been intimated to me strongly that this is not a proper diplomatic procedure—that a Nation which undertakes this is violating the sovereignty of the holy preserves of the Politburo. We have passed the period of striped-pantie etiquette. When the North Korean armies and armament swept south over the thirty-eighth parallel, these rules of formal procedure went into the ash can. Does the State Department know that yet? If not, someone should tell them.

There is one final and tremendously powerful means of reaching the people of Russia, and of the satellite countries behind the curtain, which remains to be described. There are many thousands of liberty-loving patriots gathered on our side of the curtain. They are biting their nails and eating their hearts out. They will not serve for pay as employees of our Government. They will, with sufficient support and with missions to perform, risk their lives and the lives of their wives and children on missions into the heart of the Politburo country. These men must be put to work.

Mr. President, by means such as I have just described and by other means yet to be devised in the light of developments as they appear, we can shorten the hot war. We can save billions in treasure, and an unknown number of lives of men in our own country and abroad who know what freedom is and who have found its taste so sweet that they are willing to die for it.

Mr. STENNIS and Mr. TAFT addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi is recognized.

THE KOREAN CRISIS AND MEASURES TO AVOID WORLD WAR III

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, we are being rapidly pushed toward a general war that will threaten our national existence. Neither diplomacy, negotiation, nor wishful thinking will avoid it. Our only hope is to show our utmost in strength, and a grim and unfaltering determination to see things through.

In my opinion there are two definite steps that can be taken that will greatly lessen the chances for a general world-wide war, and win it, should that war come anyway. Without these steps being taken, a general war of almost unbearable length and suffering is certain. The first step is all-out support in men and materials in the Korean war by every member of the United Nations who opposes Soviet aggression. The second step is to go on a wartime production basis in the United States. These two moves are dependent one on the other and will present a force in the world never before known.

The United States failed properly to support the League of Nations and we were thus charged with its failure, and the resulting debacle of World War II. Realizing our mistake, and also appreciating new world conditions, we launched forth in an entirely new and strong position in world affairs, and helped formulate the United Nations, and from its beginnings we have supported this great world movement without stint and without trying to play a dominating role. For this we do not deserve, nor do we claim any special credit.

Further, in recognition of the war-depleted conditions of many of our fellow members in the United Nations, we have sponsored for several years, and still sponsor an economic recovery program that covers most of western Europe. This has been at a cost of billions of dollars to us. Also, a like program has been extended to other areas of the world. For this we do not deserve, nor do we claim any special credit.

Further still, in recognition of their present need for assistance, and in reliance on their honor and integrity, we have sponsored and financed a huge military assistance program to all the Atlantic Pact nations and to other extended areas, including Korea. For all of this we do not deserve, nor do we claim any special credit.

At the call of the United Nations we immediately rushed men, planes, goods, and guns to far-distant Korea, to stop the brutal attacks of the communistic hordes. Our money is being spent, our material is being consumed, and more, our men are dying by the day, by the week.

This is the test. Where is the actual support from our United Nations allies? Where is the ground support? Where are even the firm promises of something tangible and definite that can be counted on? Week has followed week, but little definitely has been done, and little has been furnished. The call has gone forth to the United Nations members by Secretary General Lie. What is the response?

I know that over-all plans have to be made and then men and materials available have to be fitted into this plan in the most effective manner and places. This requires time. But firm pledges can be forthcoming immediately. I am not unmindful of the absolute necessity of having strong forces available at other strategic and in highly important areas of the world. As to other members of the United Nations, the impossible is not expected; the unreasonable is not demanded.

However, in this world crisis, no member nation of the United Nations should be the final judge of the extent of their obligations, nor of their ability to perform these obligations.

Each member nation can at least submit all the pertinent facts as to their ability and as to their surrounding situation to the over-all governing authorities of the United Nations, and let this over-all group decide what is reasonable support for each nation to furnish. Regardless of danger spots elsewhere, there would be a tremendous world-wide psychological power behind an all-out, all-flag, united effort in Korea. Let the other member-nation flags be unfurled and take their places alongside the Stars and Stripes, with the blue and white flag of the United Nations.

This is the test. We have met the call. Shall the United Nations continue as a reality, as an active force to be felt, or shall it continue only as a plan on paper? We, the people of the United States, are entitled to know. If we do not have an effective United Nations, then we are entitled to know that also. Then we shall make other plans. In the realm of practical affairs, we shall have little or no choice, except to abandon the United Nations, withdraw our own commitments, and travel along the road, the hard road of mere self-preservation.

But even granting the most hopeful results from the developments from other members of the United Nations, it is still a painful fact that we must go largely on a war economy. Time saved now in doing so will mean blood and misery and lives saved in months and years to come.

We hate controls, we hate regimentation. They hazard our freedom. I appreciate the fact that if we go into controls, it is possible we shall never come out from under controls. But if we do not go in, we may never come through as a nation. I appreciate the fact that in a long war, we could lose our form of government, even if we did not lose the war; and we could well lose the capitalistic system even if we did not lose the war. However, it seems clear to me that in order to preserve this very personal freedom, this capitalistic system, and this, our cherished form of government, it is absolutely necessary to have these hated controls, and the sooner, the better. By controls, I mean the effective control of wages, of prices, of materials, of manpower, and of production, and with an excess-profits tax that actually chokes off excessive war profits.

The industrial production of the United States is the most powerful war factor in the world today. It turned the tide in World War II; to put it in motion will perhaps prevent an all-out world war III. Our failure to meet the obligation of effectively using this production as our most powerful war weapon will be nothing less than criminal negligence.

GENERAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1951

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7786) making appropriations for the support of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 221, line 22, it is proposed to strike out the word "authorize" and to insert in line 23 the words "authorized by Congress."

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, last night I raised the question with the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] as to whether the committee amendment would permit the preparation of motion-picture films and other propaganda in behalf of the Brannan plan. I was somewhat concerned about the words "relating to the authorized programs of the various agencies of the Department." They might refer to a propaganda program authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture. It seemed to me that we should make it perfectly clear that what we propose to do is with reference to programs authorized by Congress.

I may say that I have checked the statements made by the distinguished Senator from Georgia. It is true that this proviso has been in every appropriation bill for the past 4 or 5 years. In my opinion, if the committee amendment were not adopted, the power to make such motion pictures would exist in the Commodity Credit Corporation, anyway, in all probability, so that even if we strike out the amendment I doubt that we would change substantially the powers. But if the Senator from Georgia will be willing, by accepting my amendment, to make it clear, which I understand is his own position, that it is not intended in any way to authorize Brannan-plan propaganda, I myself should have no objection.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I stated on yesterday that it was my construction of the language that it permitted only the dissemination of information authorized by Congress. That is still my construction of the language. I have no objection to the amendment to the committee amendment. I find that films which have been made are those which deal principally with the farm program, such as the dissemination of information through the Extension Service. I think the distinguished Senator from Ohio is unduly suspicious, but I am perfectly willing to accept his amendment.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. The point which the Senator from Georgia made last is that to which I was going to refer. As I understand, all these moving-picture films have been with respect to programs which have been authorized directly by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. RUSSELL. I shall be glad to read a list of the motion pictures which have been produced up to this time:

Brucellosis, which portrays methods for eradicating the disease on the farms.

Outbreak, a historical documentary film recording how previous outbreaks of this dread plague have been eradicated and suggesting vigilence against the disease at all times.

Today's Chicks, a film to show the farmer how healthy baby chicks are produced by cooperating hatcherymen under the national poultry improvement plan.

Forest Fire Behavior, a film to convey knowledge of fire behavior and action which may be taken toward control.

Black Stem Rust, a film to explain the nature of stem rust, how it damages small grain, and how it may be controlled through elimination of barberry bushes.

It's No Picnic, dealing with the nature and damage by forest fires, the various causes thereof, and specific ways in which forest fires can be prevented.

Dead Out, a two-reel film on forest burning in the Southeast, showing how to burn brush and grass safely.

Blister Rust Control, a series of six pictures on this disease attacking the pine forests of the country, one picture dealing with the life history of the disease and its control in a general way, and one picture for each of five regions in the country on the value of the pine and the specific problems in each region.

I may say further, Mr. President, that I have an extract from the House report on the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1943 which was passed in the calendar year 1942. It states that the consolidation was a part of the economies to be effected in order to help the war effort, and that it was provided in the bill as an economy measure and not to propagandize the Brannan plan or any other controversial question. However, I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Georgia if these moving pictures are made solely in the Office of Information. I should like to know whether or not any other moving pictures have been made by any other division besides the Office of Information. Does the Senator have the record on that point?

Mr. RUSSELL. As I understand, up to now all the pictures have been made by the Office of Information.

Mr. WHERRY. Can the Senator positively state that as a fact?

Mr. RUSSELL. No. That was my understanding. I do not know it to be a fact.

Mr. WHERRY. I am very much interested in this amendment. The House must have stricken out this provision for some reason. I agree it has been in the appropriation bill since 1943. However, this year the House deleted it.

Mr. RUSSELL. The House did not strike it out. It went out on a point of order. One Member of the House made a point of order against a number of provisions of the bill, and under the peculiar rules of the House of Representatives they were all subject to the point of order, and they all went out. We restored most of them. This is the only one as to which there has been any controversy up to now.

Mr. WHERRY. At page 267 of the House hearings justification is given for these programs. The Department of Agriculture makes this statement:

The primary functions of the Office of Information are (1) over-all coordination of all information work in the Department and (2) final editing and clearance of all publications and releases of information to the public. The Office provides a service to the Department and its constituent agencies designed to assist farmers, organizations, and institutions interested in agriculture, and the public at large, by providing factual information on results of agricultural research work, trends in agricultural production, prices, and consumption, the scope of agricultural programs and policies, and similar information which will assist farmers and the public to obtain useful knowledge pertaining to the Nation's agriculture.

It goes on to recount the work involved and emphasizes in detail some of it. It seems to me that the language is sufficiently broad to encompass not only the presentation of the Brannan plan, but any other plan which might be hatched by the Department of Agriculture, and it could be publicized not only by the Office of Information but material could be gathered and publicized by other divisions or bureaus, even though the Office of Information did not do so. What does the Senator think about that?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not see anything dangerous in the language to which the Senator has referred. When the Department of Agriculture was established it was designed to be an agency for the purpose of disseminating information pertaining to agriculture. That was its primary purpose. All that has been added to it since then, by way of farm-action programs, has been merely supplemental, because the primary purpose of the Department of Agriculture is to disseminate information pertaining to agriculture.

Mr. WHERRY. If the Senator will permit me to say so, I agree with him thoroughly in that statement. So far as research is concerned, I want to go as far as we possibly can. In fact, I should like to go even farther than we have gone. I think research results should be publicized throughout the country for the benefit of farmers.

Mr. RUSSELL. They certainly are not worth anything if they are not publicized.

Mr. WHERRY. This provision, however, raises an entirely different question. From the language read, which is the justification by the Department, not only the Brannan plan but any other policy which might be advocated by the Department of Agriculture, though not authorized by Congress, could be publicized to the public generally.

I should like to ask the Senator one more question. On page 358 of the House hearings appears a statement to which I should like to call attention. Has the Senator a copy of the House hearings?

Mr. RUSSELL. I am sorry to say that I have not. My assistant is endeavoring to get a copy of them.

Mr. WHERRY. I shall quote from page 358: "RMA project No. 205. General Economics of Marketing." In 1949 the appropriation was $13,000. In 1950 the appropriation was $134,850. I do not have the budget estimate or the amount allocated to 1951. This may be a perfectly legitimate appropriation. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator the reason for the expansion. What is the justification for an increase from $13,000 in 1949 to $134,850 in 1950. Does it have anything to do with the information we have been talking about?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not believe it has the slightest thing to do with it. All research which is carried on by the Research and Marketing Administration must be approved by an outside committee, which is appointed for the purpose of studying the whole research question. It has nothing to do with the Brannan plan, if that is what the Senator has in mind. All research projects which are being carried on in the Department of Agriculture are submitted to the committee. I did not read them to the last detail, but I did scan through the general objectives of the research projects. None of them related to the Brannan plan.

Mr. WHERRY. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. WHERRY. I think this is very important. Are these moving pictures brought up to date? Have any of them been made since those mentioned in the list the Senator read?

Mr. RUSSELL. The motion pictures set forth in the list constitute the entire number which have been produced since the information appropriations for the various bureaus of the Department were consolidated, as they were in 1942. I may say to the Senator that if we adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], which I have agreed to accept so far as I could as chairman of the subcommittee handling the appropriation, there would be a restriction on all these items which would definitely prevent the publication of any propaganda for the Brannan plan. I have been suspicious that that was the purpose of my friend from Ohio.

Secretary Brannan has defended his plan with great vigor and industry all over the Nation. He has made any number of speeches for it, and there has been some question as to the manner in which some of the audiences were assembled. But I have never yet heard any specific charge that any of the films which have been made were in anywise connected with the Brannan plan. If they had been, when we consider how controversial the Brannan plan is, undoubtedly someone would have written to the Senator from Nebraska or to the Senator from Georgia or someother Senator and said, "I saw a moving picture that is put out to publicize and to support the Brannan plan."

I am not a supporter of the Brannan plan. I am opposed to the philosophy of that plan sponsored by the Secretary of Agriculture, but I concede to him the right to go anywhere he pleases in the United States and make a speech any time he chooses in support of his plan. It may build up some support for the plan in my own State, and it may heap coals on my back in an endeavor to drive me to support the plan. But that is one of the things we will have to face when we come to it. I am not apprehensive that these films will support the Brannan plan, because I do not think the Secretary of Agriculture would adopt that policy, in view of the amendment, and I believe that if he did it would backfire on him.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I am not contending that Secretary Brannan does not have a right to support any plan he desires to, on his own, and to go to the four corners of the United States and speak on it to the public. I am in total agreement with the Senator in that respect. But I do not want the Secretary to use the taxpayers' money in any informational service to publicize a plan he sponsors, unless it is authorized by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. RUSSELL. Neither do I.

Mr. WHERRY. That is my only apprehension in this matter. I certainly have a right, I believe, to try to make it as clear as I can that we do not want him to do that.

Mr. RUSSELL. No one challenges the Senator's right. I have merely pointed out that the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio limits this expenditure to programs approved by the Congress.

Mr. WHERRY. That leads to the next question. Does it limit it? It limits it, I think, only to the transfers.

Mr. RUSSELL. Of course, that is all it limits it to.

Mr. WHERRY. How about limiting it to the full amount. It seems to me that if we put a limit of $300,000 on the amount which might be transferred from the small agencies to the office of Information, it is just as important to limit the $1,265,800 which the Office of Information can use for the same purpose.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. My amendment deals only with the particular $300,000 of the committee amendment. I was dealing with the committee amendment only. If the Senator wants a general limitation, I think it should be offered in an amendment to the bill itself.

Mr. WHERRY. I was going to ask the Senator from Georgia another question. I understand the Senator is not worried about these funds, and I have a wholesome respect for his judgment, as he knows, so that I am inclined to go along with the Senator's statement. But we are writing in an amendment to limit the authorization for these purposes to $300,000. If that is wise is it not equally wise that possibly an amendment to the general provision should be inserted, affecting programs authorized by the Congress? Would there be any objection to that?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I think that would be splitting hairs to the *n*th degree. If it would afford any great solace to the Senator from Nebraska, I would not oppose it, but I think it is utterly unnecessary. No instances have been brought forward where the Secretary has used these particular funds for the purpose of propagandizing for the Brannan plan.

Mr. WHERRY. Will the Senator answer my question? If it is necessary for the $300,000, is it splitting any more hairs to apply it to the general provision?

Mr. RUSSELL. I accepted the amendment in order to allay the fears of the distinguished Senator from Ohio and others.

Mr. WHERRY. Would the Senator allay my fears by inserting——

Mr. RUSSELL. No; am not willing to say before we reach the point where an amendment would be in order.

Mr. WHERRY. Will the Senator reflect on it?

Mr. RUSSELL. I certainly will.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the Senator feel there is any difference, so far as the funds are concerned?

Mr. RUSSELL. No; and to be perfectly frank, my reason for accepting the amendment of the Senator from Ohio was to expedite the business of the Senate. I do not think the amendment makes a particle of difference one way or the other, but I thought it would be better to accept a harmless amendment than to spend 3 or 4 hours on the floor of the Senate discussing this proposition, and having ghosts raised, and the statement made that all this money was going to be used to propagandize the Brannan plan. I am not for the Brannan plan. I have been opposed to it from the day it was announced, but I am not going around with my lance all set to joust with windmills or to attempt to slay dragons which do not exist.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator is building up a pretty big bogeyman for me to slay. I ask, Is there any difference between limiting the $300,000 and the $1,265,000?

Mr. RUSSELL. Technically, I do not see that there is.

Mr. WHERRY. Then the dragon has already been slain, and I ask the distinguished Senator if he will accept an amendment, when the proper time comes, to offer such an amendment to the bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. I shall be disposed to, if it would be any gratification to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator. I appreciate his statement.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not want to be committed to it now, until I have an opportunity to read all the language, to see where it is to be in the bill.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator, and I hope he will look with favor upon it, because my opinion is that if we are to try to limit the $300,000 which may be transferred, it is just as important to apply it to the $1,265,000.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not think it is necessary in either case.

Mr. WHERRY. I understand the Senator, but if it is necessary in one case and the Senator permits the amendment there, I ask the distinguished Senator to accept it in the other case.

Mr. RUSSELL. I shall be happy to look into it, but the amendment will not be in order until we complete action on the committee amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STENNIS in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia if he remembers whether there is a limitation on the amount the Commodity Credit Corporation may spend for publicity purposes, and, if so, what the amount is.

Mr. RUSSELL. Answering off the cuff, without guaranteeing the correctness of the statement, I think the Commodity Credit Corporation is included within the $300,000 limit, and I think that funds could be transferred from the Commodity Credit Corporation up to that amount.

Mr. AIKEN. Would the Senator say that if this amendment were voted down and the sound pictures were not permitted to be made in the Secretary's office, he could direct them to be made through the Commodity Credit Corporation?

Mr. RUSSELL. They say as much. They say they have ample authority under the law. These funds are concentrated into the $300,000 for the purpose of simplifying the bookkeeping. This is a limitation. If we vote this provision out of the bill, they could spend any funds that were available for informational purposes. This amendment tends to achieve the result the Senator from Vermont seeks, in that it puts a limitation on the $300,000, on the funds which can be spent.

Mr. AIKEN. I hope the Senator from Georgia will be proved to be correct in that view, and that the officials will not exceed the authority.

I should like to call the attention of the Senator to just one other matter which I think he can clear up. It is in connection with the provision on page 204, line 21, where the language reads:

Provided further, That none of the funds herein appropriated or made available for the functions assigned to the Agricultural Adjustment Agency pursuant to the Executive Order No. 9069, of February 23, 1942, shall be used to pay the salaries or expenses of any regional information employees or any State information employees, but this shall not preclude the answering of inquiries or supplying of information at the county level to individual farmers.

As I understand, the prohibition which was inserted in the law in 1944 prohibits this information for such services at the levels down through the county and the community levels. In last year's appropriation bill, the references to the community and county were omitted. Does the Senator from Georgia understand that the proviso I have just read means that the community and county levels of the PMA are restricted to the answering of inquiries and the supplying of information which properly comes within the scope of their own work?

Mr. RUSSELL. I think that is correct. The Senator from Vermont knows well that that language has been in the appropriation bills for some 5 or 6 years. I do not recall exactly when it was first inserted.

Mr. AIKEN. I think it was slightly changed last year.

Mr. RUSSELL. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. AIKEN. I think it was changed last year, as I recall.

Mr. RUSSELL. No; the Senate undertook to change it, but the House refused to yield, and I think it finally went out of the bill. I do not recall the year, but 5 or 6 years ago the PMA was setting up a great many so-called information centers in its regional and State offices, and a violent controversy arose as between two of the major farm organizations as to the propriety of those offices and the information they were furnishing, one of the farm organizations taking the position that some of the information was designed to aid the other farm organizations. The general complaint was made that it was entirely too expensive. So that limitation was put in originally, as I recall, in the Senate, and it has been in the bill ever since then.

Mr. AIKEN. The Senator from Georgia is chairman of the Subcommitee on Agriculture of the Appropriations Committee. It is not intended, is it, that this proviso should authorize the employment of county information specialists or propagandists, as they are commonly called?

Mr. RUSSELL. It certainly is not intended to employ any propagandists of any kind. It is intended to limit it to actual information as to farming information for the counties. Where they have the clear crop system in counties thousands of questions arise that are necessary to be answered, answers are compelled to be made, and we do not want to shut the farmer off if he will incur a penalty by overplanting by as little as 1 acre.

Mr. AIKEN. I was sure that is what the Senator from Georgia intended. I am happy he has made that point plain. I also want to assure the Senator from Georgia that no one is more concerned in making the PMA and other good agricultural programs work than is the Senator from Vermont. But we all know of instances of efforts being made to use local committees for political purposes, and I for one want to stop that practice so far as possible, regardless of in whose interests they may be used.

Mr. RUSSELL. If any program should be kept on a nonpartisan and nonpolitical basis it is the farm program. In my judgment the use of any county committee or the use of any farm program for partisan political purposes would be highly reprehensible, whether it was done to help a Republican, or Democrat, or Progressive, or States Righter, I might add.

Mr. AIKEN. I agree with the Senator from Georgia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I understand that concludes the committee amendments to this chapter of the bill. There are some three amendments which have been printed. I have discussed them with their authors and I should like to receive unanimous consent that the printed amendments to this chapter be considered at this time.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, would the Senator consider my amendment in that group?

Mr. RUSSELL. I should like to obtain some information on the Senator's amendment before accepting it.

Mr. WHERRY. I do not want to object to the Senator's request because I should like to help expedite action upon the bill. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHERRY. All committee amendments must be acted upon first, unless unanimous consent is obtained to take up other amendments out of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the rule under which the Senate is now operating.

Mr. WHERRY. Inasmuch as we have proceeded in that manner with respect to the preceding chapters of the bill, it seems to me we should continue to follow that course unless the amendments in question are very slight. What is proposed to be done by the amendments in question?

Mr. RUSSELL. One of the amendments is to be proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS]. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] has one, which has been the subject of discussion, and I have obtained information with respect to it. The other one is to be offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON]. That is a printed amendment.

Mr. WHERRY. Is that the amendment dealing with meat inspection?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes. I have had an opportunity to investigate those three amendments. I have not had an opportunity to investigate the amendment which the Senator from Nebraska intends to propose.

Mr. WHERRY. I do not know why my amendment would require very much investigation.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not think it will require much investigation, but I should like to read amendments before I accept them. I should like to read the Senator's amendment before accepting it.

Mr. WHERRY. I should be glad to have my amendment offered last, and the Senator can withhold his consent to my amendment until he has had an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from Nebraska has a perfect right to object if he desires. What I just proposed was merely to accommodate Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the request of the Senator from Georgia that, by unanimous consent, the Senate proceed to take up the printed amendments which will be offered from the floor.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, still reserving the right to object, I wish to say that I desire to be constructive about this matter. I am not acting in an arbitrary manner in order to have my amendment accepted. I should like to know, if I can be informed, what the first amendment would do. I know what the last amendment would do. I do not think it would be necessary to have a quorum call to let other Senators know what is to be taken up for consideration. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] what his amendment is.

Mr. RUSSELL. If the Senator will permit me, I will explain all three printed amendments. The first amendment, proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma, does not in any wise affect the amount of the appropriated funds. It does permit the Soil Conservation Service, in areas where work is now being carried on, to operate in connection with some lands which are not now eligible because they lie between private lands on which they are doing work and public lands in the area of a stream. The amendment would permit them to complete some phases of the projects which are essential to the operation of the whole. It involves no increase in expenditures. It merely clarifies the authority of the Soil Conservation Service.

Mr. WHERRY. Where are the projects located?

Mr. RUSSELL. I think they are located in Texas and Oklahoma. That is my recollection.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, there are 11 States involved: the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, Georgia, Tennessee, Mississippi, Iowa, Minnesota, Texas, and California.

Mr. WHERRY. Would this be the beginning merely, and would completion of the work entail some appropriations next year?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, if I may, I shall make a brief statement. In the 1946 flood control act, section 13 authorized certain work on, I believe, 11 different projects. That included the projects recommended by the Department of Agriculture. In some of those projects they did not go far enough to permit of treatment of ditches and gulleys. My amendment gives the Department the right to treat ditches and gulleys.

Mr. WHERRY. I have no objection to that amendment, Mr. President. What is the next amendment?

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] has an amendment which will increase the appropriation for research by $35,000, so as to deal with an outbreak of a disease attacking the spruce and the beech trees in the White Mountains, as I understand. The Senator from New Hampshire does not have a budget estimate, but we have in the form of dead chestnut trees so many monuments to the delay in proceeding to attack these diseases at their source that I told the Senator from New Hampshire I was willing to accept his amendment and take it to conference.

Mr. WHERRY. I have no objection, Mr. President, to the consideration of the three amendments which have been referred to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous consent request for consideration of the three amendments? The Chair hears none, and unanimous consent is given.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I submit my amendment.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia if he will not confer with the junior Senator from Nebraska? I should be glad to show him where in the bill I wish the language of my amendment to be inserted. I should like to do that so he may decide whether he will accept my amendment after the three others have been considered.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, my differentiation between these three amendments and the Senator's amendment is not due to any desire to resist the Senator's amendment. It is due to the fact that these three amendments have been printed. If the Senator offers his amendment, other amendments will be offered from the floor, and if we are to accept any such floor amendments we should accept all of them at one time so as not to make fish of one and fowl of the other.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator did for the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] exactly what he is speaking of now.

Mr. RUSSELL. Oh, no.

Mr. WHERRY. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio was not printed.

Mr. RUSSELL. The parliamentary situation in respect to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio was entirely different. His amendment was an amendment to a committee amendment which had to be passed upon. The Senator from Nebraska proposes to offer an amendment to the text of the bill.

Mr. WHERRY. Certainly.

Mr. RUSSELL. Which is not in order; whereas the amendment of the Senator from Ohio was in order, and there was nothing the Senator from Georgia could have done to prevent the Senator from Ohio from offering his amendment.

Mr. WHERRY. I understand. But the Senator from Georgia has made a unanimous consent request for consideration of amendments which he will take to conference. I simply ask that my amendment also be taken to conference.

Mr. RUSSELL. I told the Senator from Nebraska I was disposed to accept his amendment, but I should like to look into such matters and at least reasonably understand what I am doing at the time I accept amendments.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator from Georgia needs no advice with respect to what he is doing. He is one of our most able Senators.

Mr. RUSSELL. I suppose I should accept the Senator's amendment after that statement.

Mr. WHERRY. Yes. I can see no difference between the one and the others. I would deeply appreciate it if the Senator would accept my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first printed amendment coming under the unanimous-consent agreement will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The amendment submitted by Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma and Mr. JOHNSON of Texas is as follows:

On page 200, line 14, before the period insert the following: ": Provided further, That of the funds available herein, not in excess of $7,680,000 may be expended in watersheds heretofore authorized by section 13 of the Flood Control Act of December 22, 1944, for necessary gulley control, floodwater detention, and floodway structures in areas other than those over which the Department of the Army has jurisdiction and responsibility."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a brief statement explanatory of the amendment which has just been adopted.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1. The amendment is recommended.

2. The Flood Control Act of 1936 provides that improvement of rivers and other waterways for flood control shall be under the jurisdiction of the Corps of Army Engineers and that measures for run-off and waterflow retention and soil erosion prevention on watersheds should be under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture. Obviously it was the intention of Congress at the time the Flood Control Act of 1936 was passed that work on main streams would be done by the Army Engineers and soil conservation and erosion work on the watersheds would be done by the Department of Agriculture. If this is true, the work authorized in the above amendment is already covered by general authorization.

3. In the Flood Control Act of 1944 11 watershed programs were specifically authorized for the Department of Agriculture and survey reports were adopted on each of them. Some of these reports such as the Little Sioux Watershed in Iowa, the Los Angeles watershed in California, and so forth, specificially called for authority for gully control, flood water detention, and floodway structures. Some of the other reports such as the Coosa River watershed in Georgia and the Trinity River watershed in Texas did not provide for gully control, flood water detention, and floodway structures specifically, and these measures are now found to be necessary. The Solicitor of the Department of Agriculture has held that these survey reports have the force of law and since the authority for floodway structures, and so forth is omitted from them, the Department of Agriculture, even though it has general authority in the Flood Control Act of 1936 over the alluvial lands, does not have authority beyond that specifically written into the survey reports on the 11 programs set forth in the Flood Control Act of 1944.

4. Of the $9,880,000 included in the omnibus appropriation bill for flood-control work of the Department of Agriculture, the department intends to expend approximately $4,300,000 for gully control, flood water detention, and floodway structures in the alluvial lands. Some of the expenditures are already authorized in the survey reports covering the projects, but unless this amendment is adopted money for this purpose will not be available for such work in the Potomac River watershed, Virginia, West Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania; Coosa River watershed, Georgia and Tennessee, the Middle Colorado River watershed, Texas; the Trinity River watershed, Texas; and the Washita River watershed, Oklahoma and Texas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment coming under the unanimous-consent agreement.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The amendment submitted by Mr. BRIDGES is as follows:

On page 196, line 6, strike out "$2,995,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,030,000, of which $55,000 shall be available for such investigations and experiments at Bartlett Experimental Forest only."

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, unless some member of the committee objects, I am willing to take the amendment to conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment coming under the unanimous-consent agreement.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The amendment submitted by Mr. MAGNUSON is as follows:

On page 179, line 15, strike out "$7,950,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$7,952,500."

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], formerly the Secretary of Agriculture, has stated that he thinks adoption of this amendment is necessary. I was of the opinion that it was not. In the absence of full information, I am willing to take the amendment to conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, let me inquire what the amendment will do.

Mr. RUSSELL. The amendment will add $2,500 to the $12,800,000 provided for meat inspection, to allow a part-time inspector at Seattle, Wash., where there is no meat inspector at the present time, according to the Senator from Washington and the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. WHERRY. The amendment also relates to transfers of livestock.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; it relates to the transfer of cattle brought in from Canada; in other words, it relates to the international trade in cattle from Canada.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, it seems to me that the additional amount provided by the amendment is not sufficient. Furthermore, it seems to me the subject matter of the amendment should have been handled by the committee in the course of its consideration of the bill in the first place. If the necessary amounts are not studied and recommended by the committee in the course of its consideration of the bill in the first place, then we are mistaken in everything we do in connection with the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the amendment?

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, if I may make an observation at this point, let me say that it seems that under the amendment the inspection service relates to cattle in international shipment, for which it is claimed that sufficient authority is not available. Of course the amendment will not cure the difficulty if there is a lack of statutory authority.

Mr. CORDON. Of course not.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senate would have to recede under the circumstances, when the amendment came before the conferees.

However, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] formerly the Secretary of Agriculture, has said that he thinks adoption of the amendment is necessary.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, I have no objection to the addition of $2,500 to the appropriation for meat inspection in order to make possible the employment of a meat inspector at Seattle, Wash., or at any other place, so far as that is concerned, where it is necessary. However, it is perfectly apparent to all Senators on the floor of the Senate, I think, that the addition of $2,500 for that purpose does not carry any statutory authority that is not available in the bill at the present time. The amendment would simply add $2,500 to the $12,800,000, as I recall, which already is available.

It seems to me that, if there is going to be any presumption in favor of any committee and its work in attempting to reach logical conclusions with respect to appropriations, the time to commence to do so is now. If the amendment was necessary, it should have been presented to the committee, and the committee should have been given an opportunity to consider it and to act upon it.

So I object to adoption of the amendment by unanimous consent.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection until I can make an explanation?

Mr. CORDON. I am glad to withhold the objection.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, the shortage of inspectors for animals and also for plants imported into this country is not confined to the State of Washington alone. Trouble has been encountered in many sections of the country as well. It is due primarily, I would say, to the limitation on the number of hours during which an inspector can work. So, along the borders, instead of perhaps going out after supper and inspecting a truckload or a carload of cattle coming into the country, the inspectors are prohibited from doing so at the present time.

There has been a great deal of trouble along the Vermont border and along the coast of Florida in this respect. The Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] and I introduced a bill which would permit the Federal Government to allow the inspectors to work overtime, and, I suppose, to give them overtime pay, and then to recover the cost from the importers, who originally made this complaint, and who seemed willing to pay the additional cost incurred in that way. It was not a matter of cost, but a matter of accommodation, because sometimes the shipments would reach the border a few minutes after the inspector was required to stop work, according to the law; and the result would be that the cattle would have to be kept there all night until the inspector came on duty the next day.

The Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry unanimously reported the bill favorably the other day, and it is now on the calendar. The bill was previously approved by the Department of Agriculture.

So far as I know, there is no opposition to this proposal. Its enactment would alleviate much of the trouble which has been referred to by the Senator from Washington, so far as the shipment of cattle across the border is concerned.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AIKEN. Yes; if I now have the floor.

Mr. RUSSELL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I wish to correct a statement I made a few moments ago. The Senator from Washington in discussing his amendment referred to it as a meat-inspection amendment. I thought he was referring to meat inspection at a stockyard; and yesterday I stated that I could not possibly understand how it made any difference whether a cow came from the moon or from Canada or from elsewhere, once the cow was slaughtered.

However, apparently the Senator was speaking of part-time inspectors on the border, rather than meat inspectors at slaughtering houses, because I find that the amendment does not relate to the $12,800,000 which is available for meat inspection, but relates to the $7,950,000 for the control and eradication of animal diseases, which means the inspection of animals on the hoof as they come across the border, to see whether they are free from disease.

Mr. AIKEN. That is correct. No amount of appropriation would permit inspection after hours, so long as the inspectors cannot work after 4 o'clock in the afternoon. Even if 20 inspectors were available at a certain point, if they had to stop work at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, the difficulty would continue.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, I indicated my objection to adoption of the amendment by unanimous consent. I was under a wrong impression, also, with reference to the identity of the portion of the bill proposed to be amended. Inasmuch as this amendment relates to the eradication and control of animal diseases, it is acceptable to me; I have no objection to it.

However, I should like to inquire of the distinguished Senator from Georgia as to how the legal authority to act in the way suggested, if that authority does not now exist, can be conferred by means of this amendment.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not think it can. In my own judgment, I doubt very seriously that it can. My doubt is increased by the fact that the committee clerk has handed me a statement from the Department of Agriculture, which I shall now read:

[U. S. Department of Agriculture, Agricultural Research Administration, Bureau of Animal Industry]

The amendment offered by Senator MAGNUSON increasing by $2,500 the item "Animal disease control and eradication" under the head "Salaries and expenses, Animal Industry," would provide for part-time service of an inspector at Seattle, Wash., for public stockyards inspection work. Under present import regulations, cattle imported from Canada for slaughter may be consigned to a public stockyard for sale, otherwise they must be consigned directly to a slaughtering establishment. Public stockyards are those yards covered by Federal inspection of livestock received at such yards. Seattle is not now a public stockyard.

If Seattle is not a public stockyard, I have very grave doubt that the Department could assign an inspector to it to enforce Federal regulations.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. CORDON. Can the Senator from Georgia advise the Senator from Oregon as to how a stockyard can become a public stockyard?

Mr. RUSSELL. I think a stockyard becomes a public stockyard when it is posted and brought under the operation of the inspection item.

Mr. CORDON. Is there a Federal law on the subject?

Mr. RUSSELL. There is.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will yield, I might clear up the statement of the Department of Agriculture in regard to a public stockyard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I merely wanted to clear up that matter.

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield, if I do not thereby lose the floor.

Mr. MAGNUSON. It is not a public stockyard in the sense that it is operated by a public body. It is operated by the slaughterhouse which is adjacent to the stockyard, though all other slaughtering houses in the area use the stockyard. It is operated technically and jointly by all of them, but it is under the management of the slaughterhouse which is adjacent to the yard, and it is called the Union Stockyards. Anyone may ship to it. It is a sort of cooperative undertaking, managed, however, by the one slaughterhouse which is adjacent to the yard, because it happens to be located on the railroad sidings.

Mr. AIKEN. Did I not understand the Senator from Washington to say there was a shortage of border inspection?

Mr. MAGNUSON. No, this has nothing to do with border inspection.

Mr. AIKEN. It is not located on the border?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I desire to read a letter I have received from the persons affected. I placed it in the RECORD yesterday. The letter is very short, and if the Senator from Georgia will permit, I should like to read it. It poses a problem, similar to the question here. The letter was addressed to me under date of June 30, by the Seattle Packing Co., which operates the yard in question, and it reads as follows:

MY DEAR SENATOR: Although the Department of Agriculture recognizes the need for restoring Federal inspection at the Seattle Union Stockyards, it is unable to do so because of a shortage of funds. The Department estimates, however, that only $2,500 is needed to restore the Federal inspection at Seattle as only the part-time services of one veterinarian is required. It is, therefore, suggested that you obtain an appropriation of $2,500 for this purpose. This is important to the Northwest for the following reasons:

Increased control of livestock diseases is a protection to the general public. With Federal inspection the Seattle Union Stockyards would be assured that a veterinarian would be in charge and that adequate inspection with regard to communicable diseases would be in effect.

Livestock producers will be better served under Federal inspection. At the present time the Northwest is served by only two federally inspected yards. These are located at Spokane and Portland. Under State law, health requirements are enforced by the brand division, which require that all female stock be tested and tagged when sold, except when sold to a packer for slaughter or for resale at a federally inspected yard.

Since a federally inspected yard has a veterinarian on duty, the additional expense and delay required by testing female cattle is avoided. Inasmuch as the Seattle Union Stockyards are not now inspected, livestock producers tend to make their shipments either to Spokane or to Portland.

Slaughter in the Northwest area would increase. Since reductions in the tariff on meat from Canada to the United States from 6 to 3 cents per pound, effective January 1, 1948, and the termination of shipments from Canada to the United Kingdom, meat importations to the United States have been greatly increased. Due to higher wage rates, expenses, etc., in the United States, most of this importation is now in the form of meat that is dressed. It would be desirable to have it come in the form of livestock so that the slaughter and processing could be performed here. Federal inspection at the Seattle Union Stockyards would therefore greatly facilitates the movement of livestock from Canada.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will suspend a moment, the Chair observes that there is no opposition, apparently, to the pending amendment. The chairman of the subcommittee has accepted it. As the Chair understands, the Senator from Oregon has withdrawn his objection. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, a judge once said to me, "When the court is with you, sit down." I shall now follow that very wise counsel.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] on page 179, line 15.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes, for the time being, the amendments to chapter VI, and brings us to chapter VII, the Department of the Interior.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to return to chapter VI, the agricultural bill. I stepped off the floor of the Senate a moment, and while I was gone the chapter was evidently finished. My understanding from the distinguished Senator from Georgia had been that, if I requested unanimous consent, he would not object to the consideration of an amendment which I desired to offer, on page 220, in line 22, after the word "work", to insert "and programs authorized by Congress."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I do not think the proposed amendment would add to or take from the provision. I have no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senate will temporarily return to the consideration of chapter VI, and will consider an amendment to be offered from the floor by the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I propose the following amendment: On page 220, line 22, after the word "work", to insert "and programs authorized by Congress."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I desire to thank the Senator from Georgia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will now proceed to the consideration of chapter VII, and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] is recognized.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I will want to impose upon the patience of the distinguished Senator from Arizona. We are now taking up the chapter on the Department of the Interior, are we not?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. Several Senators wanted me to notify them when this chapter was reached. If the distinguished Senator will permit me, and if he will yield for a quorum call, I think we at least ought to have a quorum call. Senators will then be on notice.

Mr. HAYDEN. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Gurney	Martin
Anderson	Hayden	Maybank
Benton	Hendrickson	Millikin
Brewster	Hickenlooper	Morse

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

RECOGNITION OF COMMUNIST CHINA

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I have before me a scholarly study dealing with the Recognition of Governments, with special consideration of the current problem with regard to governments in China. The paper was written by Stanley K. Hornbeck and was presented at the forty-fourth annual meeting of the American Society of International Law in Washington, on April 29, 1950. The paper will be printed in the proceedings of the society, but its application to recent action in the United Nations Security Council on the Korean situation makes the study particularly timely now. To make it available to Congress now, I shall ask unanimous consent to have it printed at the close of my remarks.

Mr. Hornbeck is well known for his long service in the Department of State as Chief of the Division of Far Eastern Affairs and as United States Ambassador to the Netherlands.

After presenting the main principles of recognition of governments as developed by authoritative scholars, Mr. Hornbeck makes a reasoned and valuable application of them to the specific question of how the United States ought to deal with the attempt of Communist China to have its government recognized in the place of the Nationalist Republic of China. In the course of his paper Mr. Hornbeck gives strong reasons and argument why the United States need not and should not recognize the Communist Government of China at this time.

Mr. Hornbeck developed this material before the recent outbreak in Korea. Proceedings in the Security Council on the Korean situation offer powerful support to the wisdom of Mr. Hornbeck's conclusions. If the United States had recognized Communist China when we were pressed to do so, and if Communist China was then seated in the Security Council as Russia has tried to bring about by a form of parliamentary blackmail, the Security Council would have been prevented from taking the prompt and decisive action it did take in the Korean situation.

As far back as January 17 of this year I developed this question of recognition in great detail. On this floor I stated:

> Recognition of Red China by any country which has been engaged in the fight to contain world communism is surrender on another front of the cold war. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Jan. 17, 1950, p. 471.)

Had we recognized Red China at that time, the tragedy would have proved to be a double one. First, it would have been a spiritual blow to the hopes of all people of the world, particularly those in southeastern Asia, who look to us for leadership in the effort to resist the inroads of communism. Second, it would have made it possible for Red China to paralyze the Security Council by veto while the North Korean Communist invaders achieved another territorial outpost in the advance of communism.

All the reasons I advanced against recognition of Communist China are reinforced by Mr. Hornbeck's excellent paper and by the crucial events in recent world history. It is to make this record complete that I have asked to have Stanley Hornbeck's paper printed at this time.

There being no objection, the document was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

For the purposes of this part of this morning's discussion we shall consider only one of the various situations in which the question of according recognition arises; namely, that in which declaration and claim are made that there has come to power in place of an old government a new government.

A particular case is presented currently with regard to China, and to that particular case we shall in due course give particular attention. From and by developments in China there has been and is presented the question: Shall or should the United States accord recognition to the government recently proclaimed at Peking as the Government of the People's Republic of China? (For convenience, as we proceed, that Government will be called China's Communist Government, and the Government which the United States recognized in 1928 and still recognizes will be called China's National Government.)

It is important that the phenomenon of taking cognizance of be clearly distinguished from and be not confused with that of according recognition. Recognition is a matter of affirmative official action, involving an exercise of judgment and affecting status and relationships.

Consensus of legal opinion runs to the effect that there exists no absolute legal obligation on the part of any government to accord recognition to another; and, conversely, no clearly defined legal right on the part of any government to receive recognition from another. There is some dissent, but none in which it is contended that there exists an unqualified duty or an unqualified right. In practice, decisions to accord or to withhold recognition are made by the Executive and are based largely on political (including economic) as distinguished from legal considerations.

Thomas Jefferson wrote in 1792: "It accords with our principles to acknowledge any government to be rightful which is formed by the will of the nation, substantially declared." (Moore: Digest, I, 120.) This sounds very simple. But think of its implications in practice. What is meant by the words "formed by"? What are the tests of the "will of the nation"? What constitutes "subsantial" declaration? In some cases, all very easy; in many cases, more than difficult.

Those words of Jefferson were written a long time ago. They were not Jefferson's only words regarding recognition. Jefferson spoke of "our principles," not of a duty or a right.

In practice, the seemingly simple test of origin by the substantially declared will of the people has seldom been deemed conclusive; there have been applied along with or even without it other tests. The tests most often mentioned relate to: (a) effectiveness of authority; (b) ability or capacity to fulfill international obligations; and (c) disposition or willingness to adhere to international obligations, both of treaty and of law.

Professor Lauterpacht, affirming existence of a duty, says:

"When [the new government] enjoys, with a reasonable prospect of permanency, the habitual, willing obedience of the bulk of the population, outside states are under a legal duty to recognize it in that capacity." (Lauterpacht: Recognition in International Law, 1947, pp. 87–88.)

There is a good deal of qualification in that statement.

Secretary of State Cordell Hull, in the course of a communication to Mr. Tinkham, Member of Congress, May 16, 1936, wrote: "It is the rule of the United States 'to defer recognition * * * [of a new government] until it shall appear that it is in possession of the machinery of the state, administering the government with the assent of the people thereof and without substantial resistance to its authority, and that it is in position to fulfill all the international obligations and responsibilities incumbent upon a sovereign state under treaties and international law.' You will appreciate that the length of time necessary for a new government to satisfy our government upon these points will vary to a great extent as cases vary." (Hackworth, Digest, I, 174, quoted in Hyde, 2d revised ed., 1947, pp. 159–160.)

Professor Hyde says:

"No difficulty presents itself when a change is wrought through normal processes and the result is accepted as a mere incident in the life or growth of the state concerned. The situation may be obscure, however, when a contest for governmental control is waged by force of arms or by other processes not contemplated by local laws; the completeness of the success of a contestant may be fairly open to doubt for a protracted period, and even after its adherents assume to exercise the functions of government. In such cases foreign states may, and oftentimes do, withhold recognition until they are themselves assured where the victory really lies. The sufficiency of such assurance depends obviously upon the circumstances of the particular case. * * * As international law imposes no obligation upon a state to accord recognition to a new government * * * at any particular time, the bare withholding of it [recognition] is a matter of policy." (Hyde, 2d ed., I, pp. 159–160.)

Where there exist, as in China today, two contending regimes, one long since recognized and for many years in good standing, the other merely and newly claimant, it stands to reason that the problem presented to other countries is more complicated than is that presented in cases where an older regime has been destroyed or has disappeared and a new regime exercises nation-wide and unchallenged authority in its place. Toward an old regime still extant, third parties have more of obligation than they have toward a new regime not wholly and undisputedly established.

Lauterpacht says:

"So long as the lawful government offers resistance which is not ostensibly hopeless or purely nominal, the de jure recognition of the revolutionary party as a government constitutes premature recognition which the lawful government is entitled to regard as an act of intervention contrary to international law. * * * Premature recognition is a tortious act against the legal government; it is a breach of international law. * * * Such abuse of the power of recognition is vividly illustrated by the recognition by Germany and Italy of the Spanish insurgents in the early stages of the Spanish Civil War in 1936. * * * It is not for outside states to administer to the de jure government the coup de grâce by transferring full sovereignty to the victorious opponent." (Lauterpacht, 1947, 94–96.)

Judge John Bassett Moore stated in the Digest (vol. I, p. 73): "Premature recognition constitutes an act of intervention, committed in favor of insurgents or of a conqueror."

Recognition may or may not be, to use a British phrasing, "a mark of approbation," but an according of recognition to a new regime, with a corollary withdrawal of recognition from an old, certainly constitutes a choosing as between the two. It may not signify moral approval of the new, but it certainly signifies transfer of legal approval from the old to the new: it takes from the old and gives to the new the stamp of political acceptability and a certification of legal acceptance.

In the situation which now prevails in China, an according of recognition to the Communist regime involves withdrawal of recognition from the National Government. As the Chinese Ambassador to Great Britain stated to the Foreign Office official who informed him of the British Government's intention to recognize the Communist regime, the according to that recognition amounted to a "burying-alive," in British-Chinese relations, of the National Government. Such action should under no circumstances be taken without a very thorough weighing of all available facts and all conceivable implications and possible consequences.

Recognition is not an essential for maintenance of contact and carrying on of business, nor does it, when given, ensure or insure either of these.

Merchants of many countries carried on business with the Chinese, and "foreign" missionaries worked in China long before there were effected between their Governments and the Government of China arrangements constituting or implying reciprocal recognition. Later, after formal diplomatic relations had been established, the existence of these relations and the agencies thereof by no means sufficed, in numerous instances, adequately to safeguard the rights, including even that of life, of "foreigners" in China or of Chinese nationals abroad.

When the United States of America came into existence, the Russian Government refrained for many years from recognizing this country. When the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics came into existence, we refrained for many years from recognizing its government. There was, however, in each case, contact and carrying on of business.

In 1920, Secretary of State Colby wrote:

"That the present rulers of Russia do not rule by the will or the consent of any considerable proportion of the Russian people is an incontestable fact. * * *

"* * * the existing regime in Russia is based upon the negation of every principle of honor and good faith, and every usage and convention, underlying the whole structure of international law; the negation, in short, of every principle upon which it is possible to base harmonious and trustful relations, whether of nations or of individuals.

"In the view of this Government, there cannot be any common ground upon which it can stand with a power whose conceptions of international relations are so entirely alien to its own, so utterly repugnant to its moral sense. * * * We cannot recognize, hold official relations with, or give friendly reception to the agents of a Government which is determined and bound to conspire against our institutions; whose diplomats will be the agitators of dangerous revolt; whose spokesmen say that they sign agreements with no intention of keeping them." (Colby, letter to Italian Ambassador, May 10, 1920: Foreign Relations, 1920, III, 463ff.)

In 1923, Secretary of State Hughes wrote:

"When there is a question as to the will of the nation it has generally been regarded as a wise precaution to give sufficient time to enable a new regime to prove its stability and the apparent acquiescence of the people in the exercise of the authority it has assumed. * * *

"In the case of the existing regime in Russia, there has not only been * * * tyrannical procedure * * * which has caused the question of the submission or acquiescence of the Russian people to remain an open one, but also a repudiation of the obligations inherent in international intercourse and a defiance of the principles upon which it alone can be conducted.

"What is most serious is that there is conclusive evidence that those in control at Moscow have not given up their original purpose of destroying existing governments throughout the world. * * *

"While this spirit of destruction * * * remains unaltered the question of recognition by our Government * * * cannot be determined by mere economic considerations * * * or simply by a consideration of the probable stability of the regime in question. There cannot be intercourse among nations any more than among individuals except upon assumption of good faith. * * * The sentiment of our people is not deemed to be favorable to the acceptance into political fellowship of this regime so long as it denies the essential basis of intercourse and cherishes, as an ultimate * * * aim, the destruction of the free institutions which we have laboriously built up, containing as they do the necessary assurances of the freedom of labor upon which our prosperity must depend. * * *

"We are unable * * * to find any reasons for separating (i. e., differentiating) the regime and its purpose from those who animate it and control it and direct it so as to further their aims." (Hughes letter to Samuel Gompers July 19, 1923. See Hyde, 2d edition, I, 170–1.)

The United States withheld recognition of the Soviet Government until a new administration here had become convinced that that government met most of the standard tests of what constitutes a recognizable government and that it would be reasonable and advantageous to accord it recognition. Then we laid down conditions; we asked and we were given pledges. And, even at that, we were deceived. The Russian Soviet Government has disregarded both its general legal obligations and its particular pledges, including those made then to us and those made before and since to us and to other countries.

There is little if any warrant for an expectation that, with or without recognition and with or without pledges, the performance of the Communist regime in China will differ very greatly from the performances of the Communist regimes in Russia and in other Communist countries. All Communists are committed to the destruction of persons and peoples, institutions and agencies which stand in the way of world domination by communism. The Chinese Communists, whether they are or are not controlled by the Kremlin, are allies of the Moscow regime. They imitate the Russian Soviet system, they use its methods and they follow the made-in-Moscow party line.

There is seldom need for hurrying to recognize. Occasionally, there may be an advantage or a fancied advantage to be gained by quick action. There was a chance of advantage in our prompt recognition of the Kerensky regime in Russia. Our resent recognition of the Bao Dai regime in Indochina may or may not prove to have served useful purposes. Generally speaking, however, the more hurried is recognition, the more speculative is that action.

There was pressure a few months ago, both in official and in unofficial quarters, for quick recognition of the Communist regime in China. When that regime declared itself a government, the Soviet Union gave it recognition at once and 10 other Communist countries promptly followed suit. There was pressure for early and concerted recognition by several non-Communist States. Burma, India, Pakistan, and Ceylon soon fell in line. After them, the United Kingdom. Of the 25 governments which have thus far (up to April 29, 1950) accorded recognition, 12 are Communist, 7 others are Asiatic, 6 others are European. The Government of the United Kingdom is the only one that represents an English-speaking people. Latest on the list, chronologically, are Viet Minh, Switzerland, and the Netherlands. Conspicuously absent from the list are the United States, Canada, and all other countries of the Western Hemisphere, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, the United States of Indonesia, Ireland (Eire), France, Italy, Spain, and Portugal.

Reasons publicly given by high officials of the United Kingdom for that government's action ran to the effect that by prompt recognition they expected to gain commercial, political, and cultural advantages. Thus far there do not seem to have accrued any such advantages.

Arguments advanced in the United States by advocates of early recognition have been similar to those which prevailed in the United Kingdom but with emphasis on points to the effect that the Communist government represents the people of China; that, toward befriending that people, we must recognize and assist that regime; and that, by so doing, we will drive a wedge between China and Russia. During recent months the Chinese Communist leaders have, by their own acts and utterances, substantially undermined these contentions.

* * * * *

There is little that the United States might with any warrant expect to gain by a precipitate recognition of a regime which, committed to the destruction of freedom, has declared the United States next in line after Chiang Kai-shek among the objects of its political enmity. There also is little that we need expect to lose by pursuing in this connection a policy of wait and see. Our financial investment in China is not large. Our trade with China is not vital. Our cultural investment is substantial and our influence has been of consequence. But, with or without recognition, the Communist regime may be expected to deal arbitrarily with all of these.

There exists, however, a situation which makes the question of what to do about the National Government and the Communist regime in China a lively and a thorny issue; controversy has developed regarding representation of China on the Security Council and elsewhere in the United Nations. The Chinese Communist regime demands that it be admitted and the representation of the National Government be expelled. The Soviet Union supports that twofold demand and is trying, with its walkout and boycott tactics, to blackmail the United Nations into compliance with it. The United Nations, embarrassed first by the Chinese National Government's preferring of charges against the Soviet Union, and embarrassed further now by the Chinese Communist Government's demands and the pressure applied by the Soviet Government in support thereof, is greatly concerned about the menace to it of this Soviet pressure, more concerned, it would seem, than it has thus far shown itself to be about the menace to the world of Soviet pressures of the past 5 years in China and against a government there which the Soviet Government had expressly pledged itself, in special agreements, to support.

In and regarding this situation, the Government of the United States has taken an affirmative position toward sidetracking consideration of the Chinese Government's charges against the Soviet Union and has taken an essentially negative position toward the question of representation of China in the United Nations. Its spokesmen have declared that its delegation will vote against recognition by the United Nations of the Communist regime but will not resort to the veto and will accept such verdict as may be arrived at by the votes of the majority.

The Secretary General of the United Nations has formulated and has actively propagated a proposal that the United Nations pass upon the question of Chinese representation to and within it without reference to the policies or action of its member states individually in regard to recognition, and that the United Nations make its test that of exercise of "effective authority within the territory of the state" and "habitual obedience by the bulk of the population."

Adoption of that proposal by the United Nations would presumably lead to unseating the representation of the National Government and seating a representation of the Communist Government. Notwithstanding the fact that the National Government still has complete control over the whole of Formosa, which long was and presumably now is Chinese territory, with an area greater than that of Maryland and Delaware combined and a population almost equal in numbers to that of Australia, and that the Communist regime's authority is still disputed at various points on the mainland, it is mathematically true that the Communist regime does now exercise authority, extensively speaking, over most of the territory of China.

The principle of seating on the basis of mere possession of power would be consistent with policies of neutrality, nonintervention, and noninvolvement, but not with pursuit of the objective of maintaining peace with justice between and among nations.

The test of effective control is one part, but only one, of the three-part standard test of qualification for recognition. Were the United Nations to adopt the principle that effective control suffices for seating in the Security Council, and were it then to seat a representative of China's Communist regime, it would thereby be certifying to all concerned that in its view that regime has effective control and is ipso facto qualified for acceptance. It would set a precedent implying that it does not expect to concern itself, and the world need not, with questions of the origin or the character or the policies of regimes which, having acquired substantial control of a preponderance of territory, claim the right to speak exclusively for the whole of nations thus affected.

Decisions to those effects by the United Nations would put states which have not recognized China's Communist government, especially the United States, in an awkward position. It would compel them either to abandon their present positions vis-à-vis China's National Government or to develop within and for themselves split political personalities.

In brief, by adoption of Mr. Lie's proposal the United Nations might presumably effect a relaxation of the immediate Soviet pressure upon it; would, by establishing an ill-omened precedent, invite resort by successful aggressors to further such pressures at their convenience; would create for many of its members new perplexities; and would add to the bewilderment and apprehension of multitudes of men of good will who, observing the strength of the modern tendency toward solutions of fancied expediency, are being driven to wonder what faith can with warrant be placed in treaties, conventions, charters, and international law as instruments for the safeguarding of the rights and interests of nations and of peoples and of persons.

Yet, within the Lie proposal there is a germ of a possibly good idea. Might not the members of the family of nations to advantage delegate to the United Nations, by some orderly process, the function of recognition? Might not this be practicable if there first were formulated and adopted, to be followed by the United Nations in its performance of that function, a set of rules, including criteria, toward according or withholding of recognition? Might not some such steps tend to take questions of recognition out of politics, to relieve many governments of one category of embarrassing and time-consuming problems, and to reduce or eliminate one of the all too many causes of friction and contention between and among states, governments, and peoples?

The idea of a collective decision in regard to recognition is not new. It has been propounded from time to time and in various versions.

Left to themselves, individuals, governments, nations, and the United Nations see China in a great variety of lights and see in China and regarding China very different actualities and possibilities. And no wonder. To most people China, old China, has always been more or less a mystery. Today's Communist China is so different from anything with which the Occident has been really familiar that the more we see and hear of it, the more we feel like saying, with the countryman at the zoo, "There ain't no such animal."

For, as Professor Steiner, after an intensive study of its foreign policy, has recently concluded: "Communist China typifies a new kind of state, organized and motivated by a revolutionary ethic thoroughly incompatible with the existing structure of international law and relations. It struggles to attain unbridled freedom of action for the implementation of doctrines which can no longer be exposed to objective scrutiny and evaluation. If it accepts restraint, it does so from political and tactical considerations alone and not from any sense of legal obligation under international law. International law does not even receive its lip service." (Steiner, H. Arthur, American Journal of International Law, vol. 44, January 1950, p. 99.)

How can any responsible government, committed to the principles and policies which have been and which are those of the United States, seeking to act intelligently and reasonably, with the real long swing interests of its own and other peoples on its mind and in its heart and in its hands, expect or be expected to accord recognition to such a political prodigy without having first devoted ample time to study of its origin and to observation of its structure, its activities, its habits, its affiliations and its proclivities?

For the United States the question what to do about China's Communist regime is only one of many questions currently implicit in the problem of relations with China and China's neighbors. This question should, then, be considered in the light of other and larger questions, our over-all objectives in regard to China, our objectives in regard to the Far East as a whole, our objectives in regard to the world as a whole. A decision to recognize the Communist government in China, made and implemented independently of decisions with regard to those questions and problems, might easily add to, rather than reduce, the sum total of our difficulties in pursuit of and regarding our major and constant objectives of peace, justice, and security.

Getting down to fundamentals: We recognized the National Government of China 22 years ago. That government is still extant and we still recognize it. That government made resistance even as did we to Japanese totalitarian aggression. That government is making resistance, even as are we, to Communist totalitarian aggression. In the conflict between democracy and totalitarianism in which we are reluctantly but inescapably engaged, it can be no help to us to have that government disappear.

A decision on the part of the United States to recognize the Communist regime in China would require first a decision to terminate our recognition of the National Government. Implementing of such a decision would involve, constitute, and signify complete abandonment by the United States of the National Government and should imply and involve intention on the part of the United States to refrain from any encouragement of resistance to the authority in China of the government thereupon or thereafter recognized by us in place of the government thus "buried alive."

Such a taking and giving, such a transfer of legal approval, by the American Government, under now prevailing circumstances, would signify to the Chinese people, to many other peoples, and to more than a few of our own people, that in this critical case the United States prefers acceptance of a Communist domination achieved by force to a continuance of resistance thereto by a government which has declined or has been unable to comply with American advice or demands or both.

What may have been in mind when it was stated in the white book that we believe that ultimately the civilization and individualism of China will "reassert themselves and * * * throw off the foreign yoke" and that we "should encourage all developments in China which * * * work toward this end" is a fair subject for conjecture.

In the light of our traditional policies, especially of developments therein since 1928 and particularly of those since 1944, it would seem that we, the United States, should be among the last of the democracies to certify China's National Government legally defunct. And in the light of our current policies and of the recent utterances and acts of the Chinese Communist authorities we certainly should be among the last to certify China's Communist regime the government of China.

In that context and as matters stand, there persist a number of serious questions not lightly to be answered or to be brushed aside:

Can we afford to abandon a friendly government to the fashioning of whose predicament we have contributed, while that government still lives and still is resisting a common enemy?

Can we afford to add, by such an act, to the doubts regarding our standards and our reliability which already exist in the minds of various peoples whom we exhort to stand with us in a common effort to combat communism and produce conditions of national and international security?

Can we afford not only to withhold support but to withdraw recognition from a government which is actively and tenaciously resisting, with armed force, the advance of communism? Were we to follow such courses now, how could we reasonably expect opportunity to develop wherein we would even up by encouraging and supporting revolt in that area at some future moment?

Can we afford, taking into account all known factors, to invest heavily in support of resistance to the menace of communism in western Europe and at some points in eastern Asia and elsewhere and at the same time to declare disqualified a government actively engaged in resistance to an armed subjugation by communism of the most vital area and the most durably influential nation in eastern Asia?

Can we afford to accept, by facilitating the completion of the Communist conquest of China and consolidation by the Communists of their position in that pivotal and crucial area, the increase which will inevitably result therefrom of Communist pressure upon and against other areas in the Far East in which we have interests and involvements, especially Japan, Korea, and the Philippines?

Can we afford to accept by default the loss of the advantage which it might be to us to have remain alive in China at least a nucleus of organized resistance, some element allied with us in the common cause of resistance by freemen and free peoples to the armed advance of communism?

With regard to China's Communist government, we owe to China as a state and, therefore, to any authorities functioning in or for any part of China, respect on our part for the international legal obligations that are ours toward China. That is all that we owe. There exists no law or rule which requires that we accord recognition. There do exist tests which we have been in the habit of applying of qualification for recognition. This Communist government does not pass these tests. There are conceivably some problematic advantages which we might lose by not recognizing it. There is much that we would almost surely lose by recognizing it now.

With or without recognition a new government displacing or claiming to have displaced an old owes to the world respect for the international legal obligations of the state which it governs or proposes to govern. Thus far this Communist government in China has shown itself little or not at all inclined to respect those obligations.

In our pursuing of the courses which we have followed in relations with and regarding China during the years since 1944 we have incurred enormous losses. Now, in attempting to answer the question what to do about this Communist government we have a choice between evils. Either way, we stand to incur further losses. Recognition of that government, if now accorded, would constitute an acknowledgment and confirmation of losses up to date, but it would not put an end to our losing. There is only one possible course, pursuit of which might possibly, on balance, do that.

Recognition can be accorded at any time, and easily. Recognition once given can only with difficulty be withdrawn.

In the light of all these many considerations, it seems the better part of wisdom to scrutinize very carefully and, therefore, with deliberation, any proposal for transfer of recognition from an old government still extant to any new government which has just begun to function. This, especially when the old government has long shown itself favorably disposed toward us and to the world at large and the new government has, in word and in deed, shown itself hostile to us—to our ideals and practices. It is believed, then, that in this China case, we should take no action toward withdrawal, transfer, or according of recognition unless and until it becomes crystal clear that we have less to lose by such action than by continuing to stand, look, and listen. Meanwhile, as the Secretary of State, Mr. Acheson, said 4 weeks ago (April 5), the United States continues to recognize the National Government, and it would be "premature" (that was Mr. Acheson's word) to consider now any shifting of that position. [Applause.]

A PROGRAM FOR AMERICA

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUNT in the chair). The Chair understands the Senator from Arizona to request that he may yield to the Senator from New Hampshire without his losing the floor. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, gallant American fighting men are dying in Korea. Vastly outnumbered by a foe which despises the value of human life, our forces are fighting a delaying action. Why do they fight, Mr. President? To restore the peace?

Mr. President, 5 years ago our fighting men laid down their arms. They had fought World War II. Their gallantry had won that war. The sacrifices of those who fought, the sacrifices of those who died, the sacrifices of those they left behind, had been made for one purpose: Peace.

America fought World War II to gain but one objective: Permanent Peace. Our fighting men had a right to expect that the cause they advanced would be carried forward, that the world would know the beginning of Permanent Peace.

Peace is worth fighting for, Mr. President. But there are reports from Korea of bitterness and frustration. Our fighting men know of the epic failure of our efforts to establish a lasting peace. It is small wonder if there are some who feel bitter.

The essence of government is to foresee the future. This administration, like the preceding administration, has failed. This Nation cannot afford further failure. We must know where we are going. We must chart a course. We must take heed of our failures and profit from our experience or disaster will overwhelm us.

I happen to be a United States Senator who can make this speech. For 14 years, as a Member of the United States Senate, I have consistently held the same course. Since 1937 I have urged, I have argued, I have pleaded. I have said, "Resist small aggression before it becomes large aggression." I have said, "Quench the bonfire before it becomes a major conflagration."

I voted against passage of the Neutrality Act, that law which prevented us from sending assistance to those who opposed Hitler and his fellow conspirators against the peace. I was one of six Senators to vote against this law in March 1937.

By my votes and by my speeches, which are in the RECORD, I supported Selective Service, Lend-Lease, and each and every program to maintain and extend our military strength, to build our Army, Navy, and Air Force. All these programs, and a multitude of others, had my support. Sometimes the number of Senators to agree with my position was pitifully small. But Hitler and Mussolini were on the march and the Japanese war lords were sounding the war drums.

After World War II, I joined with that group of Senators which enacted the ECA program, the North Atlantic Pact, and the arms-implementation program, and other legislation. This time the danger was Soviet expansion.

At times it has been an unpopular position. Individuals lobbying against preparedness have spat on me. My life was threatened as I prepared to speak on the afternoon of December 7, 1941, because I had been labeled a warmonger.

It was a hollow triumph to find that I was right before Pearl Harbor. It is equally hollow, now, to find that I have been right about Russia.

Even as a political opponent of this administration, I certainly can find no pleasure in reciting the foolishly optimistic words which administration leaders have uttered in the last year. It is hard to believe, in the light of what they have said, that they knew the truth. Yet it is impossible to believe they did not know the truth. I knew what was happening. Many other Senators have known what was happening. A substantial part of the general public has known what was happening.

It is only with regret that I review these statements; regret born of the despair I feel as our casualty lists mount in Korea—casualties which could so readily have been avoided.

It was less than 1 year ago that the State Department issued the infamous "China white paper," a product of the thinking of Philip C. Jessup—our Ambassador-at-Large—whose personal prejudices, and those of his associates in the State Department against the Republic of China, are too well known to require further comment. Incidentally, my colleagues will recall that Jessup's last trip to south Asia was delayed while he testified for Alger Hiss. This white paper, a monstrous excuse for losing the key to the Orient, was issued on August 5, 1949. The next day the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] had read enough of it to call for a new policy in China.

It was only last December 23 that the State Department issued the secret memorandum instructing our diplomats in the Far East to write off the island of Formosa as of no strategic importance. This moved the last Republican President, Herbert Hoover, to raise his statesman's voice in protest. He suggested, only last January 2, that the Navy should be used, if necessary, to defend Formosa. His suggestion was endorsed by the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], and others.

The secret memorandum of December 23, 1949, indicates how our foreign policy has shifted to suit the whims of Joseph Stalin. Formosa had no importance to the United States in December 1949. But on June 3, 1945, when the Communists had no designs on Formosa, our State Department issued an official bulletin which commented as follows, with regard to Formosa:

> With the exception of Singapore, no location in the Far East occupies such a controlling position. (State Department bulletin, dated June 3, 1945, vol. 12, No. 310, p. 1019.)

On January 12, Secretary Acheson warned against "foolish adventures" in the Far East. Dean Acheson's policy had other advocates. President Truman at a press conference on January 5 released State Department bulletin, volume 22, No. 550, dated January 16, 1950, which said on page 79:

> The United States Government will not pursue a course which will lead to involvement in the civil conflict in China.
> Similarly, the United States Government will not provide military aid or advice to Chinese forces on Formosa.

Another Democratic spokesman got into the act on January 9. The senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said on the Senate floor:

> No, Mr. President, I shall not favor sending a single American boy with a gun in his hand to Formosa to settle a civil war six or seven thousand miles away from his home, in order to appease the political ambitions and the oratorical frothings of Senators.

This was the line. Senators could not be appeased. Joe Stalin was the man to appease.

As the Chinese Communists move up to the Korean front in support of Korean Communists, how ridiculous these recent words from the lips and pens of our leaders.

But that is not all. So determined were these men to pursue this policy of appeasement that they have failed to provide our soldiers with the minimum equipment they now need to defend themselves. Not only did our leaders mislead us, they made statements about it. Again, it is certainly with no sense of pleasure that I quote.

In the March 3 edition of the New York Herald Tribune, President Truman is quoted as follows:

> The President added that never in the history of the United States had its defenses been in such good shape except when actually at war.

Secretary Johnson chimed in on March 13 when he testified before a Senate appriations subcommittee:

> The Army is stronger today than at any time since the end of the war. * * * And as for the Air Force, it is in the highest state of combat readiness since the war.

On May 5 it was President Truman again. His statement as published in the New York Herald Tribune of that date was:

> He (President Truman) is not alarmed over the possibility of a shooting war with Russia, and backed up his optimism with disclosure that next year's defense budget will be smaller than the one Congress is now working on. * * * He told his weekly news conference the cold war situation is better now that it was in 1946.

On June 2, just 23 days before the Korean outbreak, the Baltimore Sun quotes President Truman, at his weekly news conference, as saying that he does not expect war. "In fact," he is quoted as saying, "the world is closer now to permanent peace than at any time in the last 5 years."

The administration said these things. Whether the administration believed them or not, I do not know. I knew better, and I assume the President's sources of information are better than mine.

The fact is, we are not prepared for a showdown in Korea or anywhere else. Although we have been appropriating about $15,000,000,000 a year for our defense establishment, we find we have too little. The administration has set its sights too low insofar as our arms programs have been concerned. Each military appropriation of the last 3 years has been the subject of administrative economy cuts. They did not even spend the money the Congress voted for the arms programs. The only approach to economy made by our governmental planners has been in the field of preparedness.

While we made these false economies on our national defense budget, we have spent billions of dollars in the last 5 years to buy surplus commodities and to maintain artificially high food prices. We have accumulated an unbelievable food surplus, but no surplus of tanks or planes. Commodity surpluses are no good to the men in Korea. It is not possible to stop Communist tanks with surplus potatoes or surplus peanuts.

The theory of the hand-out state is now seen in its true perspective. We had a choice of providing adequate military security or providing hand-out billions. We chose to spend our money for handouts. We bought votes instead of bullets. Our leadership took the easy way. Now we must live the hard way and it will be that much harder.

I want to make the position of this Republican Senator crystal clear. I am for our men in Korea. They are facing overwhelming odds. They see our bazooka shells and our artillery making hits on Russian tanks. They see these hits bouncing off the Russian armor like marbles. They see the tanks plunge ahead. No wonder front-line reporters write of bitterness and despair in the hearts of some of our men.

I have no doubt this is the so-called German scientist program coming home to roost. At some future time I intend to tell the Senate how the program of President Truman and our military leaders, aimed at bringing over 1,000 German scientists to the United States after World War II, was scotched by one man in the State Department. The program was less than one-fourth effective. This man boasted that the scientist program might be approved by the President of the United States and the Cabinet, but it was not approved by him. He stopped it. The German brains went to Russia. Now, the Russian tanks have impenetrable armor. And that man is still employed in the State Department of the United States.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. FERGUSON. Being a member of the Committee on Appropriations, with the senior Senator from New Hampshire, when the evidence about the stopping of these scientists was produced, I should like to ask him whether it was not true that the man who claimed to have the capacity to stop the bringing of these German scientists into this country was operating in the Security Division of the State Department.

Mr. BRIDGES. That is my understanding. I do not know that he is still in the Security Division of the State Department, but I understand he is still in the State Department.

Mr. FERGUSON. He is in the State Department at the present time?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct.

Mr. FERGUSON. It is true, is it not, that evidence was given before the committee at that time, that there was delay in the examination of the loyalty files, and that changes had been made in different boards, because of which delay had resulted for months with respect to examination of the loyalty files?

Mr. BRIDGES. The Senator is absolutely correct. Such evidence was given at that time.

Mr. FERGUSON. Was there not some evidence that the same man who boasted about his capacity to thwart the desires of the President of the United States had some responsibility for those delays?

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes; he certainly did.

Mr. President, I desire to make it perfectly clear that the military leaders wanted to have the German scientists brought here, the President wanted them brought here, but one man in the State Department, who is still in the State Department, according to my understanding, boasted that he would stop such a program regardless of what the President of the United States wanted or what any member of the Cabinet wanted.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BRIDGES. Certainly.

Mr. KEM. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he believes that the shipment of war materials from the countries of western Europe to Russia and other countries behind the iron curtain has in any way contributed to the war armament our boys are now being required to meet in Korea?

Mr. BRIDGES. I think it undoubtedly has. If we were so careless as to allow our citizens or our allies to ship material of military significance to Russia or the satellite countries, we are certainly, to that extent, guilty of having contributed to the present military situation.

Mr. KEM. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if it is not true that we learn from the reports from the front in Korea that the Russian tanks are superior to any tanks we have in the field?

Mr. BRIDGES. Such reports come to us.

Mr. KEM. In that connection is it not significant that the shipments of machine tools from the United Kingdom into Russia in the first 4 months of 1950 were 10 times the amount of the shipments of such machine tools in the corresponding period in 1949?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is my understanding.

Mr. KEM. Is it not true that those are official figures obtained from the Department of Commerce?

Mr. BRIDGES. I understand they are official figures obtained from the Department of Commerce.

Mr. KEM. What sort of business is it for us to be furnishing England steel and industrial equipment and having England in turn shipping it to Russia for sale?

Mr. BRIDGES. I cannot understand it. As the Senator knows, it was announced in the afternoon newspapers that Great Britain has finally stopped sending oil and gasoline to the Communists in Korea.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. After that question has been raised on the floor for the past several years by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire, and especially by the distinguished Senator from Missouri, and also in some measure by the junior Senator from Nebraska, the question has been asked: What about it?

Yesterday the junior Senator from Nebraska, as the Senator from New Hampshire may remember, asked the question whether we should continue to give ECA aid to the various beneficiary countries and permit them to continue to sell strategic materials to Russian satellite countries, which strategic materials finally reach their destination in the hands of the Russian Government?

I have here an Associated Press article dated London, July 18, in which the following appears:

British services operating in the Far East decided to take over all stocks of oil there for their own uses.

I submit to the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire that if shipments of oil should be discontinued to Red China, we should stop allocating to ECA countries strategic materials which may find their way to Russian satellite countries and thus jeopardize our national defense, handicap us in fighting an all-out war, and hurt our chances not only of national defense but of winning a victory in such a war.

Mr. BRIDGES. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. Would the Senator say the same thing with respect to steel and rubber? We are supplying all kinds of articles to the ECA countries for their peacetime requirements at a time when there is no longer involved the question of the dollar gap. It is a question of whether we can allocate these materials to the ECA countries when it is necessary for us to use such materials properly to defend ourselves, and send war materials to the front lines, where they are so badly needed by the boys who are giving up their lives to defend us on foreign soil.

Mr. BRIDGES. I have in my hand today's afternoon newspaper in which there is an article headed "British Stop Sending Oil to Chinese Reds; Services Take It Over." Perhaps that is the article to which the Senator from Nebraska previously referred.

Mr. WHERRY. It is. I ask the Senator if he will place it in the RECORD at this point as a part of his remarks?

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article from the Washington Evening Star of today to which I have just referred may be printed in full in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRITISH STOP SENDING OIL TO CHINESE REDS; SERVICES TAKE IT OVER—ARMED FORCES TO USE SHELL CO. STOCKS FOR KOREA OPERATIONS

LONDON, July 18.—A Foreign Office spokesman announced today that Britain has stopped all oil shipments to Red China.

British services operating in the Far East decided to take over all stocks of oil there for their own uses. Their needs have increased because of operations undertaken in carrying out the United Nations Security Council resolution for bringing back peace to Korea, the spokesman said.

Britain earlier this month turned down an American suggestion that oil shipments to Red China be limited. The Foreign Office spokesman at that time said only oil for civilian consumption was going to Red China.

The spokesman said only one British company—Shell—has been selling out to the Chinese Communists. In the first 6 months of this year, he said, total supplies amounted to 26,000 tons—less than a tenth of China's civilian requirements.

The spokesman added:

"The question of the future supply of oil products to China has, however, became academic, since the British service departments (army, navy, air force), acting in terms of the United Nations Security Council resolution on Korea, have decided to take over all stocks of oil held by the Shell Co. in the theater."

The fuel in stock in the Far East will be used by the British fleet and, presumably, by British planes.

Mr. BRIDGES. The article says the British have stopped all oil shipments to Red China. But the Russian tanks, the Communist tanks used by the North Koreans, which have moved down into South Korea and which are causing us so much trouble, and are taking the lives of American boys, were running on the gasoline supplied by a supposed ally of ours. The situation being such as it is, such shipments of oil should have been stopped before this. The shipment of such oil was a terrible thing. I am very happy that finally the British, as of this afternoon, have announced that they have decided to stop such shipments of oil.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator if the United Nations machinery, under which we apparently have gone into Korea, should not have been invoked immediately to prevent members of the United Nations from participating in or carrying out such an arrangement as the Senator is referring to, namely, permitting business as usual to continue with respect to strategic materials and war supplies, and certainly oils and gas and all such materials?

Mr. BRIDGES. Since we are now acting as a part of the United Nations police force, so to speak, in Korea, and so forth, and when the United Nations is calling upon other nations to cooperate in furnishing war material and armed forces, certainly, as the Senator from Kansas well knows, it is just as important that supplies and equipment shall go to the forces sent to Korea, as is the sending of the forces themselves. Therefore, in getting at the root of the trouble, certainly the United Nations should come into play in that respect. I think the Senator from Kansas is absolutely correct.

Mr. President, the matter of the German scientists was very important. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], and many other Senators who were interested in that situation at the time it was being considered, remember what took place. We sat in commmittee and heard a man testify that this individual said he did not care what the program of the President of the United States or of the Cabinet was, that he was going to block the coming into the United States of German scientists. As the result of this attitude on the part of some of our civilians, against the advice of the President and the military authorities, the entry into the United States of a sufficient number of scientists was blocked, and Russia obtained the bulk of them. We obtained only a few.

Let us face the cold, grim, bloody facts. Americea is in a shooting war. The cold war is over. This may be the opening skirmish of World War III. Americans can honestly face these facts. Americans can be realistic.

Or we can continue to hide our heads in the sand, utter pious hopes for the success of the United Nations under Trygve Lie, who has played the Communist tune, and continue to soften our people with more handouts.

The clouds of World War II gathered on the distant horizon of Ethiopia. They appeared to be a far distant storm. The clouds rolled closer—enveloped Czechoslovakia. We took no extraordinary precautions as the tempest approached nearer and nearer. Then when the storm broke at Pearl Harbor we spent agonizing months while American men struggled with too little too late. After a lag, while men died needlessly, we caught up with the military potential of our enemies and succeeded in defeating them.

It is the elementary precept of war that you must get there first with the most.

Let us have no more too little too late. Let us not be again lulled by the false hopes raised by false promises.

The Soviet Union has had every opportunity for 17 years to become an honorable member of the community of nations. The Soviet Union was accepted as a full partner of the Allied effort in World War II. The Soviet Union was a full partner in planning for the peace. At no time during the last 17 years, at no time during the course of a partnership which was wholly unwarranted and utterly unearned, in fact, at no time since the Bolsheviks seized power in 1917, has the Soviet Union deviated from the Marx-Lenin-Stalin preachment of unremitting war against the non-Communist world. Their bloody, godless, criminal conspiracy goes ever forward.

It must be clear to everyone that ultimately America has but two choices. We can fight communism and destroy it or we can surrender to communism and be enslaved. There is no middle course. There has been no middle course. There is no slight hope for a middle course.

There will be peace overtures. There will be deals. Tools of Soviet aggression will come forward with proposals to end the Korean war. Such gestures are intended only to further soften the United States. If we accept them, we merely give communism more time to revamp its schedule for conquest.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. Certainly.

Mr. FERGUSON. Of course, the Senator has heard of India's suggestion to Stalin that one of the peace moves be that we admit Red China into the United Nations as one of the members of the Security Council, in place of Nationalist China, and that thereafter there would be a negotiation for peace in Korea.

Does not the Senator realize that if that appeasement step were taken, it would be but the first of a series of big payoffs to the Kremlin for their blackmailing, following their withdrawal from the United Nations on the ground that they would not be in the United Nations if they could not have Red China sit beside them in the Security Council? Does not the Senator realize that once we paid that first blackmail, ever afterwards we would be at the absolute mercy of Red China, as a close ally and satellite of the Kremlin? Does not the Senator also realize that in that case, whenever Joe Stalin and his Kremlin decided to move out of the United Nations, he would always have Red China in the Security Council of the United Nations, to block any step which was not a procedural matter, and when Red China wanted to step out of the United Nations and again blackmail the United States and the other free nations of the world, Red China would have the Red Kremlin in the United Nations, where it could veto any step which was attempted to be taken in behalf of freedom and peace in the world?

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan is absolutely correct in saying that if we yielded on that point, we would simply be paying the first installment of blackmail. The Senator has stated the case very well.

Mr. FERGUSON. And, of course, once a first installment of blackmail is paid, thereafter it is necessary to follow the first payment with more or less continuous payments of blackmail, extending endlessly into the future.

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes, there is no end to blackmail.

Mr. President, there is no doubt that the Kremlin was astounded by our resistance in Korea. Stalin certainly had no right to expect resistance. His stooges in the United States had reported this country would continue appeasement.

Stalin had only to look at our record. Each time communism has tested us we have retreated, we have equivocated, we have found excuses, we have made excuses. We have sacrificed possible allies to appease Stalin's unremitting appetite for conquest. From the record, how on earth could Stalin anticipate that we would send American men to fight his colonials in Korea? It seems clear that Korea is a most unlikely place to make a stand.

It is equally clear to me that Stalin will not start the final phase of world war III, the assault on North America, until he is ready. Stalin prefers to wait until his satellites have overwhelmed their neighbors. Stalin intends to fight this war with Koreans, Chinese, Poles, Czechs, Slovaks, Bulgars, or any other colonials he can press into service. Stalin will furnish military supplies and military commanders for his puppets, but his own Russian divisions will be reserved for the final grand assault. Meanwhile he will attempt, by attrition, to wear away our resistance.

I propose that we face facts, Mr. President. This is real war. This is no police action. This is grim and bloody warfare.

We can start to fight this war now. We are 15 months behind Russia at this moment. We can begin to live hard and work hard, and we still have a fighting chance to win. I say let us get on with it.

Our choice is clear. We can continue the soft course of hand-outs to buy votes or we can take the hard choice of providing men to fight and funds to buy guns, instead of surpluses.

We require firm, consistent leadership. The responsibility for providing that leadership rests on the administration.

There must be an end to this quibbling and bickering. There can be no more glowing statements for political advantage. Now, if ever, our leadership must close ranks.

President Truman has now repudiated appeasement. His advisers must do likewise. If we can get the wise and positive leadership which we require we can establish a truly bipartisan effort in the perils which lie ahead. There can be no rubber stamp. There can be no headstrong, stubborn, or petty men in the councils of our leaders.

On March 24, 1948, I spoke on the floor of the Senate. I offered a 17-point program to stop Communist aggression. Most of those points are as valid today as they were over 2 years ago.

Today I offer an expanded program based on my original suggestions. I sincerely urge the President of the United States to adopt it as a program for saving the America we know.

Our first and foremost consideration is to arm the United States. Everything else, at this hour in our history, assumes secondary importance. Our men are making a valiant effort to hold a beachhead in Korea. They may fail. But if they succeed they will need reinforcements which will strip our home defenses. These things, in my judgment, Mr. President, we must do, and without delay.

First. Call the National Guard to the Federal service at once.

Second. Mobilize needed members of the active Reserve.

Third. Draft manpower to place our inactive paper Reserve on active-duty status.

Fourth. Establish an American radar network at once.

Fifth. Train and equip a home-defense Air Force.

Sixth. Mobilize full-speed, around-the-clock, industrial production to provide military equipment of the best type available. Weapons on paper or drawing boards are of no immediate use. The American people are ready to use steel for tanks instead of for automobiles.

Seventh. Establish and activate a civilian-defense program. It is almost criminal to have advanced 5 years into the atomic era without having such a program in full force and effect.

Eighth. Congress should at once prepare legislation to provide 100-percent mobilization of our people and our resources for enactment within hours when and if it is needed. This program should be aimed solely at achieving the safety and security of the United States. It is no place for dreamy planners to impose the controls which will lead this Nation to socialism. It cannot be a program for losing the freedom we seek to assure.

Ninth. Congress should make real and earnest efforts to balance our Federal budget. Hand-out programs should be ruthlessly abolished. Money saved should be applied to defense spending. The lower House should consider a wholly revised tax program.

Tenth. Register all Communists in the United States. President Truman should call for immediate enactment of the so-called Mundt-Ferguson bill. When Communists in Korea tie the hands and feet of American boys and shoot them in the face, we can no longer coddle the Communist fifth column in the United States.

Eleventh. Clean out the State Department. This is highly important. The small chance we have to postpone the full-scale encounter with Russia, until we are ready, depends on the skill of our diplomats. For many years our State Department has been infiltrated with men who either have unbelievably poor judgment or whose loyalty is open to serious question. It is not simply a matter of sweeping the front stoop by firing the top officials. It is a matter of a complete housecleaning. President Truman owes it to himself and his country to have the best possible advice on all levels.

The need for the housecleaning can no longer be ignored. In 1939 Stalin ruled 180,000,000 people. Today he rules 800,000,000 people. Our foreign policy of appeasement has resulted in stark disaster. The architects of failure must be swept out of office.

When an Army officer loses a battalion, he is relieved of command, in disgrace. When a naval officer loses his ship or runs it aground in the mud, he is court-martialed. But when foreign-policy advisers lose a whole continent, they are applauded or even promoted.

Mr. President, I have felt all along that there must be security risks in the State Department. I do not know the extent of these risks or of their disloyalty. Apparently, the Senate is not going to learn much about it as a result of any investigation by this Congress. But obviously, the great bulk of employees in the State Department are loyal Americans. These persons do not pose any security problem.

But I do not like the way the State Department, collectively, thinks. American thinking has never been defensive. American thinking has always been aggressive. Traditionally, our country never has sought merely to keep aggressors quietly appeased. Traditionally, our policy has been to do something about it.

We do not exercise world leadership by "waiting for the dust to settle." I believe it is essentially un-American to "wait for the situation to clarify." These phrases mean nothing, except that we do not know what we are doing or what we are trying to do. That is not the way Americans think. Americans are imaginative, forward looking. Americans have ideas. Americans get things done. America should embark on a diplomatic offensive to cut the ground out from under Communist diplomacy.

The State Department needs a real house cleaning. This is not a job of sweeping the dust under the rug with a whisk broom, or airing out the house by opening the front door and sweeping the front steps. This job calls for yellow soap, a scrubbing brush, and plenty of elbow grease, from the basement to the attic. It should be finished off with a first-class cyanide fumigating job.

We can do this for our fighting men in Korea without spending a cent. It could be accomplished long before effective reinforcements get to Korea. It would give our military morale a terrific boost. Let us clean house, Mr. President.

Twelfth. Improve and expand our intelligence operation. Foreign intelligence is almost new to Americans. We cannot expect results overnight. But it is time we called on patriots of the highest order to infiltrate Communist countries, lose their identity as Americans and, if necessary, live the rest of their lives as nameless and anonymous heroes of America's fight for freedom.

Thirteenth. Mobilize anti-Communists everywhere. This is another must. There is trained manpower immediately available. It is insanity to pick and choose our allies, when our American boys are desperately outnumbered on the battlefield. To implement this program, I urge the immediate mobilization of anti-Communist forces everywhere.

Fourteenth. Immediately deny Soviet and satellite ships access to American harbors, except under closest inspection; and establish a shore patrol to identify strange vessels which may bring atomic warfare to our coast.

Fifteenth. Make use of the Chinese Republican Army, which has several divisions of well-trained, tough, experienced troops, much closer to Korea than our forces in the United States. The Republic of China is a permanent charter member of the United Nations. The Chinese Nationalists' offer of 35,000 men should be accepted at once.

The theory that such acceptance might induce Chinese Communists to enter the Korean war is academic. The Chinese Communists already are in the front lines in Korea. Chiang is reported to have over 1,000,000 guerrillas on the mainland. We need their help, too.

Sixteenth. Immediately name top-flight anti-Communist diplomats to all trouble spots. I make particular reference to Formosa, where, as the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] has pointed out, we are represented by a consul instead of an Ambassador. It is unthinkable that we should diplomatically insult our best friends.

Seventeenth. Make Spain a full partner in the fight against communism. Our first move should be to reestablish normal diplomatic relations. Our second move should be to establish air bases in Spain. Such bases are essential to the defense of western Europe.

Spain should be invited to join the Atlantic Pact. The Spanish infantry ranks with the finest in Europe. We should equip Spanish troops and use them in the fight, if their assistance is offered.

Parenthetically, I may add that in this show-down conflict there are only two sides—Communist and anti-Communist. I am no longer impressed with arguments as to the religious or political backgrounds of governments. We have Socialist governments as full partners in this venture. They are anti-Communist, so I accept them as allies.

Conversely, Russia has subdued democratic peoples and uses them. The artillery turned on our boys in Korea comes, in part, I am informed, from the Skoda works in Czechoslovakia, a satellite which once made great strides toward democracy.

We must be practical. We are facing history's gravest threat to our freedoms. To me it seems completely reasonable that we should marshal as much help as possible. We should ask ourselves two questions: Does Spain oppose communism? Will the Spanish fight communism? The answer to both questions is "Yes."

Eighteenth. Serious consideration should be given the proposal endorsed by the American Federation of Labor to the effect that we arm and train persons in European displaced-persons camps. These stateless souls have a tremendous stake in freedom. They are the victims of communism as well as nazism. When the Russian sweep to the West comes, we should at least provide them a means of defending themselves.

Nineteenth. It has been suggested in some quarters that we should arm the Japanese people. I would accept General MacArthur's judgment on this phase of our total preparedness program. He should be asked for his opinion, and we should act on his advice. My latest information from an authoritative source was that he opposed arming and training Japanese divisions. That was some time ago, and his attitude may have changed. But we should make inquiry. I am sure my attitude has changed, but I am not in the position to speak with his authority on this subject.

Twentieth. Establish immediate quid pro quo relations with Russia and all satellite nations. This means that we allow Stalin and his associates the same diplomatic privileges which he extends to the United States, not a jot more. Unrestricted relations with Stalin and his slave states can only mean additional espionage cells in the United States.

Twenty-first. Stop all trade between the Soviet Union and its satellites, with the United States and its allies, which, directly or indirectly, has military significance. Obviously, the east-west trade, which the State Department has been promoting in Europe, has had a tendency to siphon off ECA aid and bolster the eastern European economy. Obviously, it should be stopped.

Twenty-second. Strengthen our overseas propaganda. This can be a powerful weapon in our total effort. We need a much better and more effective program of truth. We need more vigorous, resourceful, and effective personnel to carry it out. We must tell the 800,000,000 common people behind the iron curtain that we are their friends. We must tell them that the issue is joined, and that we shall render as much assistance as is possible to any attempt to throw off the yoke of Communist aggression.

Twenty-third. Advise nations outside the Communist orbit that our resources are not without limit; that they are definitely limited; that we will not assist countries which continue to pamper and coddle a fifth column; and that it is time to stand up and be counted. We must tell them this, and we must mean it.

Twenty-fourth. We must give realistic support to the United Nations. There is still hope that this organization may become the instrument for peace in which so many have placed their hopes.

Twenty-fifth. We must reestablish a sound bipartisan foreign policy. While the minority party must retain its right to be critical of the administration when it deserves criticism, I believe in times such as this we should call the best men of both parties to our councils of state. This requires a sound and well-understood system of prior consultation before decisions are made or announced. By this means Americans can give wholehearted support to our all-out efforts for peace and freedom.

The American people are ready, President Truman. They are ready for a sound, consistent, realistic program. We ask you to give it to them.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS ON INVESTIGATION OF SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona has the floor.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, I desire to submit a report, which I ask to have printed as a Senate document, and I also offer two resolutions for appropriate reference.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should like to say to the Senator that I desire a quorum call, because I know there are several Senators who want to discuss it with him before he submits the report.

Mr. TYDINGS. To discuss what?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. To discuss the question before the Senator submits the report.

As I understand, the Senator has just asked to submit a report, to be printed as a Senate document. May I ask, is that the report from the so-called McCarthy committee?

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senate committee has instructed me to submit a report, and I have submitted it.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield. I do not quite get what the Senator's point is.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Sitting temporarily in the chair of the minority leader, the Senator from Massachusetts has been asked to obtain a quorum call, in order to notify Senators, when the Senator from Maryland makes such a request. All I am asking of the Senator from Maryland is——

Mr. TYDINGS. I have the floor by courtesy of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. My understanding was, if the Senator from Massachusetts will yield, that when the Senator from Maryland inquired of me, he was merely going to submit a formal report to the Senate, and that he did not intend to discuss it.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. HAYDEN. There would be no occasion for any discussion, because, when directed by a committee to submit a report, a Senator submits it.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, sitting in the chair of the minority leader, I have been asked that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. McCARTHY] be given an opportunity to be on floor if and when the Senator from Maryland made his report. I am trying to carry out my duty. All I ask is that I be permitted to suggest the absence of a quorum or that the Senator from Maryland delay until I can get the Senator from Wisconsin to the floor.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I shall be glad to accommodate the Senator from Massachusetts, and, of course, also the Senator from Wisconsin. What I did, however, was simply to send the report forward. It will require action by the Committee on Printing before anything can be done with reference to it. I have simply filed it. I have been instructed by the committee to file it, and I can do that whether there is a quorum or whether there is not.

So far as the resolutions are concerned, they will be referred to the appropriate committees and will come back to the floor approved or disapproved, and then the whole controversy can break out.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I have not in mind what the Senator from Wisconsin wishes to do, but he asked me to give him an opportunity to be on the floor, possibly to interrogate the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me ask the Senator from Arizona if he can give me some idea when I may have an opportunity to present the matter, because I have a great deal of work to do, and I do not want to remain here all day and then possibly not have an opportunity to present the report.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I will say to the Senator from Maryland that I have asked the Senator from Wisconsin to come to the floor at once.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, if I understand correctly, the report when made is automatically printed——

Mr. TYDINGS. It has already been printed.

Mr. WHERRY. That is for the benefit of the subcommittee. The report, I understand, does not have all the data in it which it had when the subcommittee presented it to the full committee.

Mr. TYDINGS. With the exception of two paragraphs.

Mr. WHERRY. I understand that some remarks derogatory of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] were stricken from it.

Mr. TYDINGS. They were not stricken from it. I should like to set the Senator straight on that point.

Mr. WHERRY. We have to guess at these things when we do not know. I should like to ask the Senator this question: If there is anything in the report regarding any Senator—and there might be—is it only fair that in a report of this type the Senator from Maryland serve notice now that he is going to file it and let Senators have copies of it? I have not seen it myself. I saw the first page or two when we were busy considering appropriation items. Would it be in order to ask unanimous consent that the actual filing of the report be delayed until Senators can take a look at it? I want to be fair about it, and not unreasonable.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is perfectly within reason in making his request.

Let me make an inquiry of the Senator from Arizona. It is my understanding that what I have done will not bring about the printing of the report. I have simply filed it, and there will be no action as to printing it until the Committee on Printing presents a resolution.

Mr. HAYDEN. If more than the usual number, which is approximately 1,500 copies, are to be printed.

Mr. WHERRY. I am not arguing about the number.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I want to accommodate the Senator from Nebraska. I ask the Senator from Arizona if this is not the situation: All I have done has been to file the report. The number of copies which can be printed without filing the report are already authorized, or can be. But when I file the report there can be no more copies printed until the Joint Committee on Printing reports a resolution favoring the printing of additional copies.

Mr. HAYDEN. Which is usually approximately 1,500 copies.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, that is what I do not like to see done. There might be something else stricken from the report voluntarily by the committee, if some Senator raised some point regarding the report. But before any copies are printed I ask if there cannot be a delay. The report is filed, so that automatically it comes on for printing. I should like to ask that no copies be printed for 24 hours or 48 hours, if that is not an unreasonable request, so that each Senator can take a look at the report; and if there is something in it which he feels should not be printed, he can go to the chairman of the committee and talk to him about it, and the committee might, by agreement, delete it. If 1,500 copies are printed, there might as well be 150,000 copies printed, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. TYDINGS. They have already been printed for the committee.

Mr. WHERRY. But this report has not been printed.

Mr. TYDINGS. It cannot be without a resolution.

Mr. WHERRY. I understand. I am a member of the committee, and I shall be called upon to pass on the question. But a few copies can be printed.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the Committee on Foreign Relations this morning received the report from its subcommittee. It directed the subcommittee to file the report. There is no stopping the subcommittee from filing the report——

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator is not telling me anything that I do not already know.

Mr. HAYDEN. Let me finish. If additional copies are desired, it will require a resolution of the Senate. The Senator from Maryland has said he would be glad to withhold filing the report until the Senator from Wisconsin can be present.

Mr. WHERRY. Will the Senator make it, let us say, 24 or 48 hours, so that we can see a copy of the report?

Mr. TYDINGS. Let us get the situation straightened out, because I do not want to leave the Senate under any misapprehension or have any misunderstanding about it later.

I ask the Senator from Arizona, who is chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing, if I am not correctly stating the situation when I say, first, that there is printed automatically a number of copies when a subcommittee makes a report to the full committee——

Mr. HAYDEN. That number is around 1,500.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have forgotten what the number is; but what I am doing is filing the report with resolutions to print additional copies. No additional copies, as I understand, can be printed until the committee meets and considers the resolutions and makes a recommendation. I want to accommodate the Senator from Nebraska, and I shall not press the committee or demand further action until the Senator from Nebraska and other Senators have had a chance to look at the report.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, that is all I wanted. I am not quarreling about the copies which have already been printed for the subcommittee. I am simply asking, and the Senator from Maryland has agreed, to delay printing any copies of the report until we can take a look at the report, consult with the distinguished Senator from Maryland, and arrive at some date when the report will be printed.

Mr. TYDINGS. I again say to the Senator, in order to avoid any misunderstanding, that the only way by which additional copies can be printed would be by the adoption of a resolution to that effect.

Mr. WHERRY. But this report is different, in some respects, from the one which has already been printed.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. And this is the report which I am asking be held up.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator from Maryland has agreed to that.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland a question.

I noted in the statement of the Senator from Maryland, and I was very much gratified, because it had been a matter of discussion, that two or three of the passages referring to two members of the subcommittee had been deleted from the report with the advice of the chairman of the committee, but I have taken the position very firmly that, in my judgment, the Senator from Maryland was not cognizant of two sentences which were in the report when it was made and signed.

Mr. TYDINGS. I may have read it, but I have no recollection of it. The report was written and rewritten several times. Corrections were made in it. My recollection is that when I saw the report I did not see the two sentences referred to. However, I do not think the two sentences were inaccurate.

Mr. BREWSTER. I do not question that fact.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not think they were derogatory. I think they stated the facts. However, I thought courtesy of a senatorial nature perhaps would best dictate their elimination. When they were called to my attention, I suggested that the two sentences be eliminated.

Mr. BREWSTER. That brings me to one further point. Since the Senator from Maryland says he was not conscious of the fact that those two passages were in the report, I wonder whether in a 200-page report there may not be similar passages with which the Senator from Maryland is not familiar and which may be called to his attention if the request of the minority leader is granted. In that event, the Senator from Maryland may wish to reconsider such passages as to the propriety or desirability of their inclusion in the report.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not think there are any other such passages in the report. I believe I have read the reports 2 or 3 times. I have read it twice since it was printed. I have no recollection of seeing any passages of a nature which I thought advisable to remove. So far as I am concerned, the passages which were deleted were accurate. There was no reason why they should not have stayed in the report. However, we have a certain amount of comity in doing things, and I thought the sentences contained an inference which I did not believe to be in the best interests of the Senate.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so I may ask another question?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I ask this question in the light of the Senator's last observation. I thought I understood what had been done. However, I had no more than sat down when someone came over and said that I did not have a correct understanding of the situation. Therefore, I should like to ask one more question of the distinguished Senator from Maryland. It is my understanding that the distinguished Senator from Maryland is withholding the filing of the report of the committee and the resolution until we have had a chance to look over the subcommittee's report.

Mr. TYDINGS. No. I tried to make that plain so that we could avoid any misunderstanding on the subject. I shall go over it again. I have filed the report with the Senate. However, no extra copies of the report can be printed——

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. Just a minute. The Senator has asked me a question. No extra copies of the report can be printed until the Senator from Arizona calls his committee together, the committee approves a resolution, and the resolution is adopted by the Senate. I have no intention of pressing for the adoption of the resolution, or any other action on it, except to have the resolution lie on the desk.

Mr. HAYDEN. I misunderstood the Senator from Maryland. I understood the Senator from Maryland to say that he was temporarily withholding the filing of the report.

Mr. TYDINGS. I shall be glad to withhold filing it in order to accommodate the Senator.

Mr. WHERRY. That is all I am asking for.

Mr. HAYDEN. However, the Senator from Maryland has a perfect right to file it at any time.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am filing it, but I am not pressing it.

Mr. HAYDEN. I understood the Senator from Maryland to say that he would withhold filing the report. When a report is filed it must be printed as filed.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may ask another question?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. WHERRY. When a report is filed, how many copies are printed?

Mr. HAYDEN. Fifteen hundred.

Mr WHERRY. That is the point I am making.

Mr. TYDINGS. No other copies will be printed, however, so far as I know.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order. The appropriations bill is before the Senate, and is being interfered with. It is being interfered with at the wrong time. I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order has been requested. The Senator from Arizona has the floor. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHERRY. Can a Senator grant the floor to another Senator?

Mr. HAYDEN. I had the floor.

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I do not mind going back to the regular order. First, I should like to ask most respectfully for unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Maryland may withhold the filing of his report, because the filing of the report means the printing of 1,500 copies. I ask that he withhold the filing of the report until Senators have had an opportunity to study the report of the subcommittee.

Mr. TYDINGS. As I tried to tell the Senator, so far as I know, not a single copy can be printed in addition to the copies that have been printed unless the Committee on Rules and Administration acts on these resolutions.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator is in error in that respect. The subcommittee report was printed for the information of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

It was submitted to the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations. They authorized the Senator from Maryland to file it as a report from the Committee on Foreign Relations. He can do that at his convenience. He can do it at any time. He has a perfect right to do it now. He has been directed to file it, but as to when he should do it is a matter which lies in his own judgment.

Mr. WHERRY. I understood the Senator to say that he was temporarily withholding the filing of his report. I know he can file it at any time.

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well. I shall hold it up for 24 hours, until tomorrow.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, may I ask one more question?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. BREWSTER. What is the effect of any of this on the right of any minority subcommittee member to file individual views.

Mr. HAYDEN. That has been agreed to in the subcommittee. The minority views will be printed separately.

RADIO STATION KLZ, AT DENVER, COLO.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, it goes without saying that I have always championed those members of the broadcasting industry who have fulfilled the precept of "operating in the public interest, convenience, and necessity." Accordingly, I should like at this time to call the attention of the members of this body to the work of Station KLZ, at Denver, managed by a very able gentleman who enjoys the esteem of his fellow broadcasters throughout the country, Hugh B. Terry.

Hugh Terry was the sole American broadcasting representative at the UNESCO radio parley at Paris in May 1949. In addition, in 1948 he was named "layman of the year" by the Colorado State Medical Society, for his contributions in providing a better understanding of health problems. Variety magazine named him "Showmanager of the Year," in 1949. Mr. Terry has a long and useful record as a member of Denver's community life, including his service as president of the Denver Rotary Club, and his direction of the Community Chest drive and the State cancer drive. He is currently a member of Denver's board of health and hospitals.

Again, in 1950, Terry distinguishes his station by the inauguration of a new radio series called Let's Talk It Over, wherein he and members of his staff speak every week to the KLZ listening audience about problems of broadcasting. He invites listeners to address to him their comments, criticisms, and suggestions; and then he proceeds to answer them on the program. On his first program, for example, Terry discussed the reasons why the Denver market has no television. He did so in a simple, down-to-earth style, devoid of undue technical references—a program that was a public service at its best.

I feel his radio series, Let's Talk It Over, is a concrete example of a program in which a metropolitan station makes a positive effort to bring the listeners more closely and more fully into the operation of the station. It indicates a solid desire to have programs which are sincerely in the public interest. The history of Station KLZ, as evidenced by the numerous awards it has received in the past decade, is a record of splendid public service. The new series, Let's Talk It Over, represents a continuation of that high public-service consciousness. As evidence of that, let me call to the attention of the members of this body an article by Ken White, a member of the Denver Post staff, which appeared on June 6, 1950. Because Mr. White so forcibly explains the high purpose of this series, I ask that his article of that date be inserted as a part of this RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Denver Post of June 6, 1950]

KEN WHITE ON THE AIR—HOWS AND WHEREFORES

Hugh Terry, the boss wrangler over at KLZ, has started himself a radio program which can do a lot to help people understand how a radio station—any radio station—operates, week in and week out; why it can and does put certain things on the air; why it makes schedule changes which frequently are confusing to the listener.

Terry calls his program Let's Talk It Over. The first broadcast was heard last Saturday at 12:15 p. m. The KLZ veep and general manager says he wants to make it a talk-it-over feature in the true sense of the word. He wants listeners to ask anything they please about radio, and particularly about KLZ. He'll answer, with the help of his department heads.

Terry is a pretty straight talker, and I believe he'll answer criticism, if any, of KLZ's operations about as objectively as any station manager could be expected to. Nothing he might say would merit respect, otherwise.

He also, by the way, is an accomplished mike performer. Knowing his subject, he didn't bother with a script on the first program—dealing with television prospects—and the colloquy with Matt McEniry, the announcer, profited from the resulting naturalness.

No matter the point of control, radio is a pretty remote business.

Stations traditionally take their punishment and praise in silence. They profit from some of both; actually try, most of them, to be guided by what they hear from listeners.

Individual performers reach listeners, but at management level there's traditionally an aloofness that makes it difficult for listeners to feel anything for a station's call letters.

Often stations get criticism anonymous and otherwise; that is unfair—not unfair intentionally but because listeners lack information on which to base criticism. To them many a change that can be defended as necessary—if a station tells them about it—seems merely high-handed affront. Programs go in, programs go out, favorites disappear. Not always is the originating or relaying station to blame, as Terry will try to make clear.

He will, of course, take a realistic approach—a radio station makes its money by programming programs that bring in money.

If it has a conscience, it tries to program some programs of limited appeal which it believes are in the public interest.

If its manager is crazy, he believes he can please everybody at the same time. Hugh Terry is not crazy.

He feels he's programming the way he should; will explain on Let's Talk It Over why things are done the way they are, up there in the Shirley-Savoy.

Not that he'll be talking defensively all the time. Doubtless many letters merely will ask for clarification of various procedures.

By contributing to a better understanding of radio, via this program, Terry will win friends for the station—friends who will feel closer to it—and to other stations, as well, perhaps.

UNITED STATES SUFFERING DEFEAT ON PSYCHOLOGICAL FRONT

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an article entitled "United States Suffering Defeat Throughout World on Psychological Front; Bold Action Held Needed by Truman To Organize Peace Information Office." The article is by David Lawrence, and is of such importance that I think it should be printed in the RECORD, so that all Members of Congress may read it.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SUFFERING DEFEAT THROUGHOUT WORLD ON PSYCHOLOGICAL FRONT—BOLD ACTION HELD NEEDED BY TRUMAN TO ORGANIZE PEACE INFORMATION OFFICE

(By David Lawrence)

Much worse than the set-backs on the Korean front are the defeats being suffered throughout the world on the psychological front both by the United States and the United Nations.

Never, it might be said, in so grave an international situation has there been such a conspicuous lack of imagination and such timidity as is being exhibited by the United States Government in fighting the psychological war.

The Soviet Union has grasped the initiative and has made flank attacks around the United States in the propaganda battles in Asia as well as in Europe.

The lazy answer to this is that the United States hasn't provided the funds—the Marshall plan of ideas, as Senator BENTON, of Connecticut, calls it. But the truth is that even if $100,000,000 is appropriated, it would be ineffective if our Government fails to express itself forthrightly in the propaganda field.

THREE WEEKS OF INACTIVITY

More than 3 weeks have passed since the Kremlin put the North Korean government up to an aggression that has startled the world. The United States and the United Nations responded with military effort, as yet unsuccessful, but at the same time the Soviet triumphantly grasped the initiative on the propaganda side. The Russians accuse the United Nations along with the United States of sanctioning aggression. Peace petitions are being circulated with tens of thousands of signatures by the Communists in a publicity stunt which is not being combated effectively by the western democracies.

In the face of the plain aggression in Korea, nobody in our Government or in the UN has officially, formally, and loudly called Moscow the aggressor. The United Nations, moreover, has invited American boys to be killed but politely hesitates to warn the nations helping to kill American boys that those nations are aggressors, too. While it is obvious that no nation can be asked to supply military help against its will, it is traitorous for any member of the United Nations at the same time to be supplying arms and military power to the country which is fighting the United Nations forces.

Senator HOMER FERGUSON of Michigan has pointed this up in a speech in the Senate in which he demands that the Washington Government request the UN to adopt a resolution warning any nation helping the North Koreans that it will be regarded as a partner in the aggression.

The UN got considerable prestige by adopting a resolution calling for military forces to resist aggression in Korea, but it will rapidly lose that prestige if it stands idly by and lets the Kremlin supply munitions to the North Koreans in an obvious attempt to defeat the United Nations forces, including the United States.

POLICY MAKERS FLOUNDER

The propaganda war is being poorly handled not because there are not enough technicians to do the job or because there are inadequate transmission facilities. It is falling down because nobody in the Truman administration with authority to act has vision enough to realize what a propaganda war means. It doesn't mean just a battery of mimeograph machines and a $7,000,000 building in New York. It means that the men who make policy—men with the courage of their convictions—must call a spade a spade in public. The policy makers are floundering. Three weeks of valuable time have been lost while the American Government cravenly refrains from denouncing the Kremlin leaders as the true aggressors. The answer usually heard is that this might offend the Kremlin—as if "appeasement" is the way out of Korea.

What is needed is a new executive board or commission of three eminent men to give full time to the work and be responsible directly to the President and not to any Cabinet officer. The head of the Office of War Information was responsible in World War II directly to the President. He must be free again to tell the President what any member of the Cabinet is doing or failing to do that is hurting on the psychological side of warfare. He must be free to speak out in the meetings of the National Security Council, of which he should be a member. The task canont be performed by a subordinate unit in the State Department. The top level officers of that institution are too busy writing legal notes in the field of diplomacy and too much steeped in traditions and forms to use the vocabulary of propaganda war.

America is losing on the military side in Korea but not for long. America is losing, however, on the psychological front and there is no sign of any turn in the tide. It will take bold action by the President to organize an Office of Peace Information and to give it the proper instructions to engage in a world-wide crusade of truth.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

H. R. 940. An act to authorize construction of the Eklutna project, hydroelectric generating plant and transmission facilities in connection therewith, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 5866. An act to adjust and define the boundary between Great Smoky Mountains National Park and the Cherokee-Pisgah-Nantahala National Forests and for other purposes.

GENERAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1951

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7786) making appropriations for the support of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, before the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the committee amendments to chapter VII, making appropriations for the Interior Department, I wish to make a brief statement respecting this chapter as reported to the Senate.

The House considered budget estimates totaling $669,251,505, approving appropriations in the amount of $522,134,130. After the bill passed the House, supplemental estimates in the amount of $5,720,000 were received by the Senate, increasing the total 1951 budget estimates to $674,971,505.

Although the Senate committee approved $5,698,000 of the $5,720,000 in supplemental estimates, the total of chapter VII as reported to the Senate is $617,006,030, or $5,128,100 less than chapter VII as passed by the House and $57,965,475 less than the 1951 estimates. Percentagewise, the total approved by the Senate committee is eight-tenths of 1 percent under the House total and eight and fifty-nine hundredths percent below the 1951 estimates.

Of the $617,006,030 in cash appropriations approved by the committee, approximately $65,000,000 is for the liquidation of prior contract authority.

The total new contract authority for the Interior Department as reported by the Appropriations Committee is in the amount of $37,830,000, which amount is $420,000 less than the amount allowed by the House, $6,920,000 less than the 1951 budget estimates, and which is $27,421,700 less than contract authority granted for the fiscal year 1950.

Mr. President, I may say that some of the reductions were larger than I personally felt should have been made. On the other hand, some of the reductions were not so large as some members of the subcommittee felt should have been made. In this respect, the bill is a compromise and represents a very honest and earnest effort on the part of the subcommittee to make the reductions in the amounts and in the specific appropriations where it was felt reductions could best be made. As I have stated, the final result is a bill which in cash is $5,128,100 under the House bill, despite the inclusion of $5,698,000 in supplementals not considered by the House, and $57,965,475 under the 1951 budget estimates, and in contract authority chapter VII is $420,000 under the House bill and $6,920,000 under the 1951 budget estimates.

BUREAU OF RECLAMATION

Of the $617,006,030 recommended by the committee, $324,104,000 is for the Bureau of Reclamation, and this amount includes $5,445,000 in supplemental estimates not considered by the House.

There are no new projects included in the 1951 budget estimates or in the committee's recommendations. The amount of $324,104,000 recommended by the committee, although it includes $5,445,000 in supplemental estimates, is $1,004,000 under the House bill, $35,214,500 under the 1951 estimates, and is $32,650,510 less than was appropriated to the Reclamation Bureau in the fiscal year 1950.

Mr. President, I may mention, in this connection, because the larger reductions of the bill come out of the Bureau of Reclamation appropriations, that it is a result of an effort on the part of the subcommittee, and the committee having the bill in charge, to take into consideration the effect in dollars of the Taber-Thomas amendment as adopted by the House of Representatives.

The bill as it passed the House was sent to the Department of the Interior with the request that they examine it to determine how much money they would lose if the Taber-Thomas amendment were put into effect, and having determined that amount, to see if a similar sum approximately as great could be taken from the bill where it would hurt, but would not hurt so much; and that is what we have accomplished.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CORDON. It is, however, a fact, is it not, that the Interior Department, in carrying out the request of the chairman of the subcommittee, did so by reducing construction items, and not by reducing other activities included in the bill?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is not entirely correct, but largely so.

Mr. CORDON. To what extent is it in error?

Mr. HAYDEN. It is in error in that there are some reductions made that are not in construction items, but the primary effect is upon the construction items, and it was possible for the reason that upon examination of the carry-over of unexpended balances on some of the projects it was felt it would be safe to make the reductions in those places.

Mr. CORDON. Will the chairman of the subcommittee at the appropriate time advise the Senate as to the reductions voluntarily made by the Interior Department in items other than construction?

Mr. HAYDEN. I shall be very glad to do so, because I have a tabulation which covers the entire amount.

Mr. CORDON. Is the tabulation in shape so that it might be placed in the RECORD today for the benefit of the Senate tomorrow? It would be helpful in studying the effects of the bill, particularly with respect to activities other than the activities of the Bureau of Reclamation, which, as I recall, has taken all the cuts. The Senator advises there are other matters. I was not aware of them.

Mr. HAYDEN. I will ask the clerk to make a search through the table and advise the Senator later in that regard.

BUREAU OF INDIAN AFFAIRS

For the Bureau of Indian Affairs, the committee recommends appropriations in the amount of $80,746,055, which amount is $3,953,055 in excess of the House allowance but which is $5,250,320 less than the 1951 budget estimates.

The larger increases recommended by the committee are for restoring funds for California Indians, all of which had been deleted by the House, additional funds to meet deficiencies in State educational contracts for the education of Indian children, additional funds for Indian school construction, and improvement of roads on Indian reservations.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. CORDON. Would it not be well to advise the Senate with respect to the necessity of restoring the amounts in connection with the activities having to do with the Indians in California, where a cut was made by the House which eliminated all funds for those Indians, and the cut was made under a misapprehension both as to the fact and the law?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, it appears from the record that three gentlemen appeared before the House Committee on Appropriations asserting that they represented the Indians in California, and that the Indians in California wanted no assistance whatever from the United States. Taking them at their word, the House committee struck out, anywhere in the bill under the Bureau of Indian Affairs, any item affecting the Indians in California. It was stated in the report that the House eliminated $2,554,975 from the budget estimates. When the matter came before our committee the Representatives in Congress from California appeared, the Senators from California appeared, the officials of the Bureau of Indian Affairs appeared, and it was determined definitely that the gentlemen who assumed to speak for the Indians of California had no authority whatsoever to speak for them. For that reason we have restored proportionately the money recommended in the budget estimate for the Indians of California. Where a reduction was made a proportionate reduction was made in the California Indian appropriation..

BONNEVILLE POWER ADMINISTRATION

Another large item in the bill is for the Bonneville Power Administration, for which the committee recommends appropriations totaling $44,000,000 and contract authority in the amount of $20,000,000.

The amount recommended by the committee for construction, $39,500,000, is $2,000,000 less than the amount approved by the House and $2,500,000 less than the 1951 estimate.

For operation and maintenance the committee approved $4,500,000, which amount is $500,000 less than the House allowance and $750,000 less than the budget estimate.

GOVERNMENT IN THE TERRITORIES

Of the $617,006,030 total appropriation proposed by the committee, a total of $53,588,285 is for government in the Territories, including the administration of Alaska, Hawaii, Virgin Islands, and Guam, construction of roads in Alaska, and the continued rehabilitation of the Alaska Railroad.

The total of $53,588,285 recommended by the committee is $3,741,215 less than the total of $57,329,500 approved by the House, and is $5,189,315 less than the 1951 budget estimates of $58,777,600.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield for a question?

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. CHAVEZ. In making his statement the Senator referred to the expenditures by the Government for the Territories, and he mentioned Hawaii, Alaska, and Guam, but did not mention Puerto Rico. Was there any particular significance to that?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes. In the case of Puerto Rico all of the internal-revenue collections go to the Territory, and that amount is sufficient to support the government of the Territory, and an appropriation is not required from the Treasury of the United States. It is different in the case of the Virgin Islands. Since I have mentioned the Virgin Islands, I should say they have been paid for two or three times over by the internal-revenue collections on the rum produced there, all of which revenue goes into the Treasury of the United States. On the other hand, it appears each year as though we are making a donation or gift to the island. If the same rule applied to the Virgin Islands as is applied to Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands would have a magnificent surplus in the Treasury.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I think it should be pointed out, so that the public may know, because of the importance of Alaska as a strategic outpost of this country, that what the Senator is discussing is the internal appropriations, and that it has nothing to do with the millions which have been appropriated for military expenditures, which also includes the improvement of roads.

Mr. HAYDEN. What we include in the pending bill is for continuing the improvement and operation of the Alaskan Railroad and many highway items, but it does not apply to military construction in any sense.

Mr. MAGNUSON. But in some cases the military construction and the money appropriated in the pending bill almost overlap.

Mr. HAYDEN. The military authorities strongly recommended placing the railroad in good operating condition. But we do it in this bill rather than in some other bill.

SOUTHWESTERN POWER ADMINISTRATION

With respect to the Southwestern Power Administration, I am glad to report to the Senate that the Secretary of the Interior, the Administrator of the Southwestern Power Administration, and the private power companies in Oklahoma have agreed upon a means of integrating the hydroelectric power produced at Government dams with steam power produced by the private utilities in a manner which will provide for servicing public bodies with Government power as contemplated by section 5 of the 1944 Flood Control Act and which will serve as a pattern for similar contracts with public utilities in the southwest power area.

Senators will remember that last year there was considerable controversy in this body as to what should be done with respect to appropriations for the Southwestern Power Administration. The Senate decided in that respect, as it did with respect to the Reclamation Service, that in order to negotiate upon an equal footing with the private utilities, the Southwestern Power Administration should be supplied with sufficient funds so if satisfactory wheeling or integrating contracts could not be made, that the necessary transmission lines would be constructed by the Southwestern Power Administration. I expressed the opinion at that time that if the money were granted and placed in the hands of the Southwestern Power Administration, it would be possible to work out such an agreement with the private power companies there that the money would not actually have to be expended.

I felt that the tendency was growing, particularly in the southern area of the United States, for all private power companies and the public power development to live and to let live. I illustrated that by the fact that the Alabama Power Co., the Mississippi Power Co., and the Georgia Power Co. refused to join in the fight on the Tennessee Valley Authority steam plant, showing that they were getting along very well in that area in the matter of power, and that they would not participate in a fight of that kind. I believed that if we gave the Southwestern Power Administration ample money to carry on a program if necessary, it would prove not to be necessary, and that is exactly what has happened in that area. They have come to an agreement.

I think perhaps the best way to describe that agreement is to quote from the words of Mr. Douglas G. Wright, the Southwestern Power Administrator, in an address delivered at Muskogee, Okla., dedicating the SPA building there on July 15, 1950. Mr. Wright said:

> There isn't any point in rehashing all of the things which have gone before us. But this is probably one of the greatest weeks in the history of Oklahoma. Oklahoma has found the way, through a perfectly freely arrived at bargain. The American way of bargaining, where we fought like the very devil. Where we pushed and shoved—where we used every kind of a force known.
>
> Pushing one way, and then another, we finally arrived at an agreement. An agreement with the Oklahoma Gas & Electric Co. and the Public Service Co. of Oklahoma which placed Oklahoma in the No. 1 spot in the Nation, in my judgment, in power potential. Oklahoma today has available the resources of the $130,000,000 Oklahoma Gas & Electric Co., the $100,000,000 Public Service Co. of Oklahoma, and at least a $250,000,000 Government development program, to utilize for any power need she can think of.
> Her consumers have achieved what I have been pleased to call the No. 1 freedom of power. This is, namely, your right to decide where you will get your electric power, what you will do with it as you use it, and whether or not you will own any part of the facilities which serve you.

He further said:

> Under that contract, the utility companies have agreed with the Government that the consumer does have the No. 1 liberty—the right to decide where he buys his electric power, and what he does with it after he buys it. We have agreed to that.
> Secondly, the companies and the Government have agreed that the Government has the right to sell its power to whomever it desires, on whatever terms it desires.
>
> And, third, we have agreed that the companies have the right to sell their power to whomever they desire, on whatever terms they desire.

Then he adds:

We had a perfect marriage. It was love at first sight. The only trouble was nobody could figure out who should provide the dowry. Both sides wanted the dowry in this case. Well, we finally settled it in the American way. Each side gets part of the dowry. And you people who use power are going to get the benefit from all of this integration.

I think Mr. Wright is to be congratulated upon the conclusion of this very fine contract.

In that connection I desire to say that I have observed this matter very closely from time to time, and I found that the power companies in Oklahoma at all times were actually engaged in a serious effort to come together and to arrive at an agreement. There was no backing or filling and no dodging. I was convinced all along, although there were some who were not so convinced, that where there was the spirit to come to an accord an accord would be reached.

I particularly want to state that R. K. Lane, of the Oklahoma Public Service Co., impressed me as being a man who, standing stoutly for the interests of the people who invested their money in his company, yet realized that cooperating with the Government in an effort of this kind gained profit to them, and that it could be done in a way that was entirely in keeping with the present public-power policies announced by the Congress.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. KERR. To clarify a point in my own mind I should like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee a question about the committee report which discusses briefly the SPA continuing fund. I refer to the language of the committee report found at page 130 of the report to accompany House bill 7786, as follows:

The subcommittee on Interior Department appropriations conducted joint hearings with the subcommittee on agricultural appropriations, which handles the appropriation for the Rural Electrification Administration, on the use of the continuing fund of the Southwestern Power Administration for the purpose of aiding in the construction and operation of facilities for producing and transmitting power for the use of public bodies and cooperatives. This program involves the expenditure of loans of considerable amounts by the REA to a combination of local cooperatives and the lease of the facilities by the Southwestern Power Administration. The continuing fund is being used for this purpose to an extend not contemplated at the time SPA was created. The committee feels that the utmost care should be exercised by those administering this fund to avoid its use in any instance where it is not absolutely necessary to enable public bodies and cooperatives to secure sufficient power to supply customers. It is not the intent of the committee that the continuing fund be used directly or indirectly in the construction or operation of power-producing facilities and transmission lines to compete with private enterprise in areas where adequate power is available or will be made available within a reasonable time at reasonable rates to the cooperatives and public bodies.

It is my understanding that one of the purposes of the continuing fund was to facilitate the interchange of power between SPA and other suppliers in our area, and the marketing of power by SPA.

If I remember rightly, the fund was first set up at the time SPA entered into the Texas contract with the power company down there. The interchange of power is, as I understand, an important part of that arrangement and it is good deal both for SPA and the power company.

Now that the Southwestern Power Administration and the Oklahoma Utilities have signed an operating contract, to which the chairman of the subcommittee has so eloquently and forcefully referred, the continuing fund of the Southwestern Power Administration must be used to make that contract operative. It is my understanding that because of the assurance that this contract would be signed, the Appropriations Committee was able to reduce the request of SPA for funds, actual and contractual, by approximately $6,000,000. This saving results because the lines and facilities of the Oklahoma utility companies will be available for transmission of power to SPA customers, but the continuing fund is necessary for such an arrangement.

Mr. President, I assume that the language relating to the SPA continuing fund in the report was not intended to interfere in any way with the type of arrangement contained in the contracts which have been entered into by SPA and the utilities on the one hand, and on the other hand by SPA and the rural electric cooperatives in Oklahoma and nearby States, and which were described before the committee during the hearings.

I should like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee if I am correct in that assumption.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct. The Oklahoma situation is this: All the representatives of the REA's in Oklahoma who talked to me said that they were hopeful and anxious that an integrating contract might be made between the private power companies and the Southwestern Power Administration. They felt that was to their advantage in the area. On the other hand, I have heard no complaint from any private power company in Oklahoma as to the arrangement made by the Southwestern Power Administration with the REA development in that area.

The Senator is perfectly correct. It is just as important, so far as a revolving fund is concerned, that money be made available to meet balances of payments from time to time, either with the private power companies or with the Rural Electrification Administration. That is the purpose.

What we criticized in the report were developments above and beyond that, in other sections of the country. However, so far as Oklahoma is concerned, no one has complained about what has been done by the REA in that area, either publicly or privately. I understand that the arrangement is entirely satisfactory to all concerned.

Mr. KERR. I thank the chairman of the subcommittee very much.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Senator from Arizona will remember, I am sure, that this controversy has been before the Congress, and especially before the Senate subcommittee, for some 3 or 4 years.

I think the Senator also will remember that recently the Southwestern Power Administration made a contract with the Texas Power & Light Co. So far as I am aware—and I think the Senator from Arizona knows more about this matter than I do—that contract is working satisfactorily.

Is it not a fact that the contract which has recently been made is a replica of the Texas Power & Light Co. contract, but is adapted especially to conditions in Oklahoma?

Mr. HAYDEN. The difference between the Texas Power & Light contract and the Oklahoma contract is that in the Texas agreement nothing was said or done and no arrangements were made in regard to supplying power to municipalities, whereas in the case of the Oklahoma contract a municipality or the Rural Electrification Administration or the Government itself—any or all of them—get the combined service of the company's power and of the Government's development of power, by means of the integration.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Am I correct in saying that the present Oklahoma contract is more favorable both to the Government and to consumers, the consumers being, first, the REA and preferred customers under the Flood Control Act of 1944?

Mr. HAYDEN. That was the real difficulty, namely, to see that there was no distinction as between preferred customers, as set forth under the water power act—that is to say, regardless of whether it was a municipality or a Rural Electrification cooperative or the Government itself or any public agency. It was necessary to see that all were treated alike. That was not the case under the Texas contract, because, as a matter of fact, there were no municipalities there that wanted any power, and that question did not arise as an issue. However, it was bound to arise in Oklahoma. It has been solved to the satisfaction both of the Southwestern Power Administration and to the private power companies.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Is it not a fact that under the Oklahoma contract the Government is able to sell to the existing utilities all the power it can produce, both firm power, secondary power, and even dump power?

Mr. HAYDEN. The situation in that area, so far as hydroelectric power is concerned, is somewhat different from the situation elsewhere, where the Government is producing large quantities of firm power. If my recollection is correct, there are approximately eight rivers which are to have flood-control dams built on them. Those rivers vary in flow a great deal. For that reason, as the dry season comes on, the volume of water in the reservoir lowers, and the amount of firm power which can be developed lessens. If ideally situated, it is possible to fit that fluctuating power into a steam-plant system, whereas if the fluctuating hydro-electric power were not available, the steam plant system would have to have stand-by steam plants, and large amounts of money would have to be invested for that purpose.

So this arrangement—utilizing the Government power, which is mainly unifirm—integrates that power into the system of the private power companies. Then when the Government takes out power to supply to its preferred customers, it is firm power, available 24 hours a day and every day the year 'round.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. As a matter of fact, the State of Oklahoma has a great many rivers which are fed by flash floods coming from northwest Arkansas, southwest Missouri, southern Kansas, southeast Colorado, northeast New Mexico, and western Texas. Those floods flow into the rivers which carry the water across my State, and eventually the water goes either into the Arkansas River, which flows through Arkansas, or into the Red River, which flows through Louisiana.

In our State there are no rivers which are constant in flow. So the only water we have, as a rule, is the water coming from the so-called flash floods.

Therefore, in order to provide power, we must catch the water in reservoirs, and must hold it there. By doing so, we serve flood control, and later on we run the water through turbines and create electricity.

My point is that under the Oklahoma contract the Government is able to sell all the power it can create, both firm power, secondary power, and dump power, because the utilities can take the power when it is available, and at such times they can close down their steam plants to some extent and can depend on the use of the floodwaters. Then when the floods have abated and are over, the private power companies can fire up their steam plants and can begin to operate again on the basis of steam power.

So this system enables us to get the greatest possible amount of revenue; and at the same time, according to the Southwestern Power Administration's announcement, the rate will be 5.6 mills per kilowatt-hour, which is the second cheapest rate in the entire country, so I am advised.

Mr. HAYDEN. I understand that the rate to public bodies in Oklahoma will be among the very lowest in the United States, and that it is advantageous to pursue this course, as demonstrated by the testimony of Mr. Wright, who justified our action in recommending that, under this bill, $6,000,000 be taken from the cash and contract authority. His testimony further is that it means a saving of at least $850,000 a year during the years to come; and as he so aptly pointed out in his remarks, that saving inures to the benefit of the consumers of power in the Oklahoma area.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It is a fact, I believe—and I think the Senator from Arizona will confirm what I say—that by virtue of this contract, the Government will be able to avoid the appropriation of vast sums of money for the building of transmission lines; but, instead, the Government will be able to use the existing transmission lines for transmitting the power, and thus will make the saving. There will be a saving to the Government, and also, as I think the Senator will agree, all money invested in transmission lines eventually must be repaid by the consumers of electricity.

Mr. HAYDEN. Wherever a transmission line is built, either by a private utility or by the Government, the rate for electricity must be fixed at such a point as to make it possible in the course of time, to amortize the payments for the transmission line.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I think time will demonstrate the wisdom of the Oklahoma contract, in that both parties will be benefited—a somewhat unusual situation under a contract. The Government will be benefited, and also the consumers will be benefited, because both will have the advantage of the second cheapest power rate in the entire country.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Government had unfirm, fluctuating power, which by itself could not bring a very good price. The private power companies had steam plants which they would have to maintain in excess capacity for stand-by service, but which they are not now required to build or to maintain, because they can obtain the Government power. So one hand washed the other.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. For some time the Members of the Senate who handle the Interior Department appropriation bill in the Appropriations Committee have been very anxious to hold hearings to develop a Federal public power policy. Does not the Senator from Arizona believe that the Oklahoma contract, together with the Texas Power and Light contract, go a long way toward developing a national policy?

Mr. HAYDEN. I think they will be highly valuable in that respect.

I may add that the same policy which we adopted, as applied to the United States Reclamation Service, has borne good fruit. First we provided in the bill money with which to construct transmission lines from the Hungry Horse Dam in Montana. That area is divided between the Reclamation Service, on the eastern slope, and the Bonneville Power Administration, on the western slope. The power company violently opposed the construction of any transmission line into Anaconda, but we provided for it.

As a result, they got together with the Bonneville Power Administration, and made a contract which is entirely satisfactory both to the Government and to the company.

In Colorado there has been considerable difficulty. My information from the Reclamation Service is that there has been agreement in principle upon a wheeling arrangement which is entirely satisfactory. There remains in Montana one difficulty, which I shall discuss a little later, with respect to a transmission line.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, if the Senator from Arizona will permit a further observation, let me say that I wish to pay my respects to the administrator of the Southwestern Power Administration, who has been working on this matter for all these years. I think it is to him that we must give credit for doing the detailed headwork in the preparation of both the Texas Power and Light Co. contract and the so-called Oklahoma contract. I believe he has rendered a signal service to the public, and especially to the electric industry, by the development of those two contracts.

I also wish to pay my compliments and respects to the chairman of the Interior Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], because he has been intently interested all these years in trying to work out something which will relieve his committee and the Congress of the necessity of guessing as to appropriations for these purposes.

With these contracts in existence, so far as these two States and the Southwest are concerned, we have a pattern, and if the private companies are unwilling or for any reason refuse to build the lines which are necessary, I think it is understood that the Congress will be called upon to build them. As one member of the committee, so long as I am here, I shall be very glad to go along and help build such lines. So I pay that compliment to the chairman of the subcommittee, because I give him credit for working out this matter to a very high degree.

Mr. HAYDEN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, at this point I should like to offer for the RECORD a brief statement. It is a part of a speech I made at the dedication of the Dennison Dam, which took place on July 1, 1944. That was before section 5 of the Flood Control Act was enacted. I ask permission to incorporate that very brief statement at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the extract was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

How will this power be distributed?

Public power, as a rule, is produced as a by-product of flood-control, reclamation, and navigation developments.

The Government should not, in my judgment, enter the field of power development in such a manner as to destroy the value of existing power facilities which have served and are serving the wants and needs of the people.

It seems to me that a cooperative plan of power development and distribution may be worked out whereby the people in the cities and on the farms may receive the benefits of such power at reasonable rates.

Such a plan should embrace a program wherein the Government may create the electrical energy and the existing distributing systems may take the current at the point of manufacture and thereby both the Government and the existing systems may profit by such cooperative plan of operation.

Former Senator James P. Pope, now a Director of the Tennessee Valley Authority, has just made the following statement:

"There is no doubt but that this cooperative effort, which makes for efficiency, economy, and better service, is here to stay and will play an increasingly important part in the future development of the public and private power industry."

Unless this policy is adopted the Government will be forced to build stand-by steam plants and in addition will have to build transmission and distributing lines in order to deliver the electricity to the consumers.

The Government is interested in making a success of its flood control, reclamation, and navigation power developments.

The public is interested in securing electricity at a reasonable price.

These two interests can be harmonized and adjusted to the benefit of both the Government and the consumers.

This is one of the problems that must be solved and when it is solved it must take into consideration the injury done by removing property from taxation and then it must give credit to the values which may be created as the direct result of the making available of an abundance of cheap power.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEHMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. As I understand the statement of the Senator from Arizona, in describing the Hungry Horse project, the point which the Senator was trying to make was that if this appropriation had not been made, the chances of getting private power companies and others together on a power contract would not have been so good as they were when the Southwestern Power Administration or the Government had the authority to do it if the others did not.

Mr. HAYDEN. That was the policy we adopted last year, and I am going to say it has proved to be practical and sound. In each case, when the private power company learned that if it did not make a contract satisfactory to the Government, the Government would build transmission lines to serve its own customers, they then arrived at a settlement which was mutually satisfactory.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. HILL. I was very much interested in a question which the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR] asked the Senator from Arizona with reference to the language on page 130 of the committee report dealing with the Southwestern Power Administration. I was very much pleased, I may say, with the answer of the Senator from Arizona. I was not at all surprised, but I was pleased that he made the answer he did, because, as he indicated in his answer to single out REA co-ops and deny them the advantages of arrangements involving the use of the SPA continuing fund, while permitting its use to make payments to private power companies under the Texas and Oklahoma contracts, would be rank discrimination against the REA co-ops.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Wright made it perfectly clear in his testimony that this revolving fund was just as necessary in order to do business with the private power companies as it was to do business with the REA's or for the REA's to do business with the private companies.

Mr. HILL. Certainly the committee had no intention whatever of saying anything or doing anything that would discriminate against the REA cooperatives.

Mr. HAYDEN. No; they were to be treated alike.

Mr. HILL. Exactly alike.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I desire now to conclude my remarks by saying that I have covered the larger items included in the bill, and without taking the time of the Senate to discuss the committee's recommendations on appropriations for all of the bureaus and services in the Interior Department, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks certain summary data and tables included in the committee's report, which set forth the over-all action of the committee on chapter VII and its recommendations with respect to each bureau and service.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a suggestion at this point?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. With respect to the Columbia Basin appropriation, the House committee allowed the full amount requested by the Budget Bureau. The Senate committee cut $3,700,000, as I recall, or $4,000,000 from the amount. I was wondering whether, for the purpose of the record, the Senator could give us a brief explanation of the reduction.

Mr. HAYDEN. The reason the Senate committees reduced that amount under the Budget Bureau's estimate, and under the amount appropriated by the House, was that we were trying to recover as much money as we could in different places in the bill, to equal the cut that would be made if the Taber-Thomas amendment were adopted. In doing that, we found that, so far as the Columbia Basin was concerned, as in other instances, there was a carry-over of an unexpended balance, which, in the estimate of the engineers of whom we inquired, made it safe to make a reduction at this time. In other words, we wanted to be sure there was sufficient money in the bill to meet all contractual payments for construction projects which were going on during the year, but, where there was more than that, we preferred to let it go over to another year.

Mr. MAGNUSON. In regard to this particular instance——

Mr. HAYDEN. We are quite confident that this would in no manner interfere with the orderly progress of construction on the project.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Adequate planning for next year will be taken care of, because of the overlays and the amount that was given. Is that correct?

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Arizona a question: In his judgment, and in the judgment of the committee, are there sufficient funds to make it unnecessary to curtail any of the developments of the REA programs which have been brought before the committee?

Mr. HAYDEN. The REA money, I may say to the Senator, is carried in the agricultural chapter of this bill, and I am sure the amount allowed is ample for that purpose. The only purpose of this section of the bill, chapter VII, with respect to REA, is to provide for cases in which some service is rendered by the Southwestern Power Administration in the Senator's area.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. That is what I am getting at.

Mr. HAYDEN. The way I understand the situation, so far as southeastern Kansas is concerned, and so far as southwestern Missouri and Arkansas are concerned, is that the Oklahoma contracts as they have been developed, are to serve as a model or basis for similar contracts elsewhere within the area, and, where suitable integrating or wheeling arrangements can be made with private companies in the Kansas or Missouri area, or elsewhere, it then will not be necessary for the Southwestern Power Administration to construct transmission lines to serve preferred customers; just as it happened in Oklahoma. If, however, suitable arrangements cannot be made, there is then authority to see that the preferred customers of the Government are served, customers such as the municipalities and REA.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the first committee amendment in chapter VII. The clerk will state the amendment.

The first amendment, under the heading "Chapter VII—Department of the Interior—Title I—Office of the Secretary—Salaries and expenses," was on page 230, line 12, after the word "service", to strike out "$2,315,000" and insert "$2,100,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 230, after line 12, to insert:

STANDARDIZATION OF GEOGRAPHIC NAMES

For expenses necessary for carrying out the provisions of the act of July 25, 1947 (43 U. S. C. 364), including personal services in the District of Columbia and printing and binding, $14,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Enforcement of the Connally Hot Oil Act," on page 231, line 3, after the word "binding", to strike out "$200,000" and insert "$180,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Operation and maintenance, southeastern power marketing area," on page 232, line 7, after the word "binding", to strike out "$150,000" and insert "$100,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Construction, Southwestern Power Administration," on page 232, line 14, after the word "expended", to strike out "$10,350,000" and insert "$8,620,000", and in line 19, after the word "exceed", to strike out "$6,000,000" and insert "$1,730,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Operation and maintenance, Southwestern Power Administration," on page 233, line 7, after the word "area", to strike out "$760,000" and insert "$660,000."

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, for and on behalf of the senior Senator from Oklahoma, we desire to ask the chairman of the committee to eliminate that amendment and to let the figure stand as passed by the House, at $760,000.

Mr. HAYDEN. I may say to the Senator that the sole and only reason the committee had for making that reduction was the assumption that, having reduced the amount of appropriation and authorization by some $6,000,000—the appropriation part of it by a little more than $1,000,000—we thought that perhaps there would not be as much operation and maintenance to be undertaken, and so we made this cut with the idea of taking it to conference and then determining what it actually should be. In other words, we had no testimony of any kind from anyone upon which to base the cut or to justify the cut. We simply acted on general principles.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator that his assumption that the costs of operation with reference to construction have decreased is accurate and well founded. However, as he is probably as well aware as is any other Member of this body, upon the completion of the contract between the Southwestern Power Administration, the utility companies, and the REA, we have now advanced many years in the scope of area served and the extent of operation carried on, and where we will have some saving with reference to the operation and maintenance of construction projects which will not be built there will be a corresponding increase in the operation and maintenance with reference to the over-all picture of the operation.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Nebraska is a member of the subcommittee, and my understanding is that the appropriation does carry a percentage increase over the figure for last year. The figure last year was $525,000. I may be in error, but my understanding is that we increased the figure to $660,000.

Mr. HAYDEN. The amount carried last year was $525,000. The budget estimate this year was $785,000, of which the House allowed $760,000, and we took off another $100,000. We took it off by guess, without any particular reason.

Mr. WHERRY. Is it not a fact that the budget estimate was increased to take care of the very situation which the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma has mentioned, and that when the facilities were reduced about $1,000,000 out of $6,000,000 the administration cost was reduced in that amount?

Getting back to my original question, is it not a fact that the increase this year is $660,000 to continue the improvements which the distinguished Senator is talking about?

Mr. HAYDEN. The justification reads as follows:

It is anticipated that approximately 340 miles of additional transmission lines and related facilities will be completed and ready for operation and maintenance in the fiscal year 1951. These additional facilities, together with the 500 miles of transmission lines already being operated and maintained, will entail an estimated cost of $575,000 in the fiscal year 1951 as compared with $375,000 in the fiscal year 1950. The costs for fiscal year 1950 did not represent a full year's operation and maintenance cost, as the program was initiated in that year, and the necessary staff to operate and maintain the 500 miles of transmission lines was not required until the latter part of that fiscal year.

Mr. WHERRY. This justification was made prior to the time the contract was negotiated which permitted a cut in the appropriations for construction.

Mr. HAYDEN. No. There is no connection, if the Senator will bear with me, between the reduction in the amount of money and the appropriation of this amount of money for operation and maintenance except that in the future, according to the testimony, there will be more lines brought into operation this year than were brought in last year.

Mr. WHERRY. Perhaps I did not state it correctly, but there is the connection that, if lines are not brought in, the increase allowed will take care of the costs this year.

Mr. HAYDEN. If we appropriate money this year to construct a line, until the line is built we do not operate and maintain it.

Mr. WHERRY. I understand that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bonneville Power Administration—Construction," on page 234, line 9, after the word "expended", to strike out "$41,500,000" and insert "$39,500,000", and in line 14, after the word "exceed", to strike out "$21,750,000" and insert "$20,000,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Operation and maintenance," on page 234, line 22, after the word "energy", to strike out "$5,000,000" and insert "$4,500,000."

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I should like to discuss this amendment very briefly. I am not objecting to the reduction in construction, but there is a very serious matter involved in the operation-and-maintenance figure, and I wish to point it out in the hope that when the bill goes to conference the conferees will be able to provide a better figure than that which is suggested by the committee.

The Bureau of the Budget recommended $5,250,000 for operation and maintenance of the Bonneville power transmission system in fiscal 1951. The House approved $5,000,000, a reduction of $250,000. The Senate committee cut this an additional $500,000, leaving the Administrator only $4,500,000 to carry out all of the vital functions required to operate and maintain a transmission system relied upon by almost every community in the entire Pacific Northwest.

I urge the Senate to reject the committee amendment. By so doing we will insure that the $5,000,000 allowed by the House is available to BPA in the coming year.

The potential adverse effect of the $500,000 Senate committee cut is out of all proportion to the dollars involved. Let me give the Senate just one example of how serious could be our failure to provide adequate operation and maintenance funds.

Everyone here by this time has become aware of the importance of aluminum production both to a peacetime and to a preparedness economy.

The most essential ingredient in the manufacture of aluminum is large quantities of low-cost electric power available 24 hours a day without interruption. I repeat, without interruption.

Aluminum metal is made in factories called potlines.

The term is descriptive.

Each potline is a building with 128 large cauldrons placed in a row.

Heavy electric fixtures are affixed to each pot so that strong, continuous electric current can be poured through it.

The pots are filled with a sugarlike crystal known as aluminum oxide. The current is turned on and other mineral is added.

It is a continuous process. I repeat, it is continuous.

As the metal is drained off the pots new raw material is added.

If the current should fail to supply one of these potlines for as much as three consecutive hours, it would take 2 weeks to get back into production again. The metal and other mineral would freeze in the pots. The electrodes might be damaged. The frozen minerals would be painstakingly chipped out. The 128 pots would be slowly brought back into production, one at a time.

The average aluminum potline produces about 100,000 pounds per day. Thus a 2-weeks' delay, due to a single 3-hour electric-power failure, would mean a production loss of 1,400,000 pounds of aluminum.

The Bonneville Power Administration serves electricity to 19 aluminum potlines in the Pacific Northwest. This represents half the aluminum production of the entire country.

The power system of the Bonneville Administration has been consistently overloaded since the last war. There is so little reserve capacity left in it, due to growth of power use, that any little disturbance can cause a power failure throughout the entire region.

The Bonneville transmission system is like a rubber band that has been stretched around a parcel too big for it. There is no spare stretch left. If any little thing goes wrong, the whole assembly flies apart.

Constant vigilance is required by the Bonneville substation operators to detect and forecast the possibility of trouble.

Constant alertness is required to cut repair time to a minimum after trouble develops. A little money goes a long way here.

A few hundred thousand dollars can mean maintenance crews stationed every 50 or 100 miles instead of every 200 miles.

And a single hour's travel time can mean the difference between 2-hour power failure for 19 aluminum potlines and a 3½-hour power failure.

A single hour's travel could mean a difference of 26,600,000 pounds of aluminum production for the Nation's needs.

The proposed reduction in the operation and maintenance funds of the Bonneville Administration strikes directly at the reliability of service to plants which supply half the Nation's aluminum.

No utility can guarantee against occasional power failure. But inadequate funds for the operation and maintenance of the system can guarantee that there will be a considerable number of power failures.

Lack of a relatively few thousand dollars can mean too few men, too many miles apart to adequately service a 3,000-mile transmission system.

Too few men will inevitably mean overtime. Overtime will mean fatigue. Fatigue will mean human error and delay.

We must not speculate on our aluminum supply now. These Northwest aluminum plants must be kept in continuous production at all costs.

This means continuous power supply.

It is hoped that in view of the serious situation confronting us, which may grow even more serious due to events in the past few weeks, the conference committee will give very serious consideration to this matter, because it involves one of the most vital matters which exists today in our country, namely, the production of aluminum. The conferees may wish to reevaluate the operation-and-maintenance figure.

I urge full restoration of this cut in operation-and-maintenance funds for the Bonneville Power Administration.

This agency is paying a profit to the Federal Treasury each year.

From the standpoint of economics, from the standpoint of ordinary good business, and, above all, from the standpoint of national security, these funds should be restored.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am sure that Dr. Raver will make the necessary recommendations to the committee.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Yes.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. CORDON. In view of the comments of the Senator from Washington with respect to potlines, it should be noted that the amount originally requested for 1951 for maintenance and operation of transmission lines was $3,400,000. The amount for the over-all administration is $4,500,000. I come from the Pacific Northwest, and I am interested in the proper operation of Bonneville. However, like every other activity of Government, it must have money appropriated for its operation, and in view of present conditions I hope the committee's action will be sustained.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator to say that the amount requested was $3,500,000?

Mr. CORDON. For transmission maintenance and operation it was $3,400,000.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I understood it was $5,250,000, and that the Budget Bureau approved that figure.

Mr. CORDON. The Senator is in error in his understanding of the make-up of the appropriation item. Three million, four hundred thousand dollars was estimated for the operation and maintenance of the transmission system, $600,000 for power marketing, and $1,165,000 for general administrative activities. The point I make is that so far as the transmission system is concerned it is more than $1,000,000 within the figure the committee reached. I join with the Senator from Washington in his suggestion that a careful check be made when the matter reaches conference. I am satisfied that the system can be operated within the figure which the committee has recommended.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, representing in part the State of Montana I am naturally interested in the Bonneville power program. I wish to record myself as being in accord with the distinguished Senator from Washington in this matter.

There seems little point in appropriating hundreds of millions of dollars over a period of years for the construction of vital electric power facilities and then permitting these facilities slowly to deteriorate for lack of adequate maintenance.

Yet the proposed reduction in the operation and maintenance funds of the Bonneville Power Administration will bring about this circumstance.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I can assure the Senator from Montana that the Government has no intention of allowing that to happen. It does not intend that the plants should deteriorate. It has conducted a good job in the past, and it will conduct a good job in the future. The subcommittee in this case is one of the best subcommittees in the Senate. They went into the matter very thoroughly. They heard much testimony. They have pursued the matter with the greatest of care and deliberation. They will see to it that what the Senator fears will not happen.

Mr. MURRAY. I am sure of the intention of the committee.

During the past several years I have noticed a recurring pattern in the debates and action on this item.

The Bonneville and Department of Interior officials, in their contacts with Members of the Senate each year, have been uniformly reasonable and complaisant on most appropriation adjustments proposed by this body.

But for the past 3 or 4 years, they have told us a consistent story on operations and maintenance money.

In brief, they have pointed out that, while we have been adding to the size and value of their plant each year, we have not been making commensurate increases in allowances for maintenance and operation of that plant.

Furthermore, I am told, the Bonneville operations records reflect this situation. Each year, there is a little more news in the Pacific Northwest newspapers about severe power failures than in the previous year.

The amount of funds involved in this item is not large. The committee has cut the House figure by $500,000. Without this $500,000 much maintenance work on the Bonneville-Grand Coulee system will be left undone.

Now perhaps this would not matter if such work were delayed for a year; but I am reliably informed that much of this work has already been delayed for several years and that, due to rising costs and inadequate funds in past years, the backlog of incomplete maintenance work is slowly piling up and bringing nearer and nearer the evil day when failures in equipment will bring tremendous and serious losses.

This House should reflect carefully on the consequences of power failure in the Pacific Northwest. Half the Nation's aluminum production is in that region and is served directly by the lines for which this budget item is designed to keep operating.

Three-fourths of the weight of every military plane is aluminum and our national aluminum capacity right now is insufficient for civilian needs—let alone military requirements.

This half million dollars will buy a great deal.

Failure to spend it will inevitably cost us a great deal.

I urge that the House figure be restored.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I merely wish to say that not only is the subcommittee one of the best subcommittees of the Senate, but it is a sympathetic subcommittee. This subcommittee is philosophically favorable to the project.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield.

Mr. MURRAY. Yes.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Both the Senator from Montana and I appreciate the fine work which the subcommittee has done. Our only suggestion was that the importance of keeping the aluminum potlines in operation may give rise to the advisability of perhaps reviewing the matter in conference.

Mr. MURRAY. I sincerely feel that the members of the subcommittee have done a splendid job. I know it is not their intention to permit any deterioration of these great works on the Columbia River. At the same time through accident or inadvertence appropriations may not be forthcoming to carry out the programs as they should be carried out. I do not think it is necessary to dwell on the matter any further. I merely wish to record myself as agreeing with the Senator from Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 234, line 22.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Land Management—Management of lands and resources," on page 235, line 22, after the word "Management", to strike out "$6,756,800" and insert "$7,127,810."

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, last year there was appropriated $6,215,000. The House bill increased this sum by nearly a half million dollars more, to a total of $6,757,000. The Senate committee now proposes to raise this sum by $371,000 more, to a total of $7,128,000. I am rounding off the figures to the last thousand. This would represent an increase over 1950 of $913,000.

Mr. President, the House figures are already $541,000 above the 1950 expenditure. In view of the stringent economic conditions of our country, and in view of the fact that the increases provided by the committee are for somewhat doubtful purposes, as I shall show in a minute, I hope very much the committee amendment will be rejected, or, better still, that the chairman of the committee, out of the kindness of his heart, will withdraw the committee amendment.

Mr. President, I should like to point out that in this increase of $371,000 above the House figure, $100,000 is for range reseeding. It seems to me the Grazing Administration would do much better to prevent overgrazing from occurring than to permit it to occur in the lands it leases, and then spend tax money to reseed the land which has been overgrazed.

There is a second item of $75,000 for weed control in the California and Oregon forests. I do not know what particular weeds are flourishing there, but apparently they are seeking an appropriation to put down Scotch broom or similar weeds. At any rate if this program is necessary, expenditures for it should be taken from the increase already granted by the House.

There is an increase in the item for general administration, although the House had already allowed $903,000, making the total virtually $1,000,000 for administration, which seems to me to be a very high figure.

Finally the committee provided an increase for what are called "cadastral surveys" of $100,000. I was somewhat puzzled by this elaborate phrase "cadastral survey," and I looked it up in the dictionary and found that it means "an official register of the quantity, value, and ownership of real estate, used in apportioning taxes." In view of the fact that the House had already allowed $743,000, and this is another $100,000, this seems to me a rather expensive "cadaster."

I take it that another term for the "cadastral survey" is the "Domesday Book" which William the Conqueror imposed on England. Let us beware of making this appropriation bill another Domesday Book for the American taxpayer and for the resources and manpower of the country at a time when we need them for defense.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the Bureau of Land Management produces revenue for the Government. The amount of increase allowed by the subcommittee was not so much as I personally would have liked to see allowed. When we have an agency which handles income-producing property of the United States, which, if it has proper supervision, can bring greater revenue into the Treasury than the cost of the service, it is highly desirable to make adequate appropriations for it, just as it is to employ additional internal-revenue collectors when they can bring in more money than their salaries cost.

Mr. President, that is the situation with respect to this Bureau. I believe that if the Senator were as familiar with the facts as the subcommittee is, he would heartily agree with us that when it comes to supervising properly leases for oil and gas on the public domain, and for the handling of the grazing land to get a better income, and so on, that, from the standpoint of business enterprise the Bureau of Land Management has not been adequately supplied in the past.

For that reason, the Bureau of the Budget, realizing that this is a revenue-producing agency, increased the amount recommended to Congress over the appropriation of last year to $8,650,000. The committee did not allow that much, although I would have liked to see it allowed. I believe it would be a good investment for the Government of the United States to appropriate the full budget estimate. We would make money by doing that. But we compromised in the committee, and the figure in the bill is the amount the committee stands on. I hope the recommendation made by the Senator from Illinois will be rejected.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, I have worked on this subcommittee for some 3 years, and I believe that the recommendation of the subcommittee in the matter of the appropriation for the Bureau of Land Management is founded in sound logic, based upon testimony which wholly warrants these several increases.

In the instance of the Grazing Administration, the Government is faced with a condition and not a theory in the vast Columbia Plateau grazing areas. These areas were overgrazed many, many years ago, some of them to the point where there was hardly any grass growing year by year.

The reseeding will give an opportunity to bring into forage production vast areas where there is no value at the present time. In addition to that, the necessities in the grazing areas are well known to the people of the West, not, of course, so well known to those who have not lived there.

We in the West realize that there are uncounted thousands of acres of privately owned land which today have value because they can be used in connection with supplemental land that is now administered under the Taylor Grazing Act. Without that supplemental range those privately owned lands would be substantially worthless, in many instances.

With respect to the item of $75,000 for forest management, the Senator from Oregon has a particular and personal interest in that item in the bill, due to the fact that it represents a necessity in western Oregon, where the revested railroad grant lands are situated. The lands represent every other section, or every odd section, for some 200 miles north and south in western Oregon, and in an area that will run from 20 to 40 miles east and west.

The intermingled lands are privately owned. A noxious weed poisonous to livestock is now growing in that area. The State and local governments, counties and the like, have set up weed-control districts. They are fighting to save the range in that area from this noxious and poisonous weed. What they do on their lands will be of no value if they do not have cooperative effort from the United States. Hence the appropriation of $75,000.

In the cadastral survey item, the committee was particularly interested in the necessity for early survey of the public domain in certain parts of Alaska. If I remember correctly, of the vast area of Alaska something like 3 percent has been surveyed. The greater portion of even those parts of Alaska which now are being settled is unsurveyed. There is little hope that there can be development in Alaska, as a Territory or as a State, until there can be a survey of the lands so that they may be alienated if, as, and when that is proper to the development of the Territory.

As to the general administration item, the subcommittee over a period of years past, in cooperation, I may say, with the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, has urged the Interior Department to get its house in order with reference to its records in the public lands field. The reorganization of the Interior Department in the past 3 or 4 years has resulted in a great lessening in the number of applications for leases on the public lands. Due to this reorganization, at the present time we are hoping that the Bureau of Land Management may go forward with its perpetuation of land title records, something vitally important, as of course every lawyer immediately understands.

The base of title to land, of course, rests in the patent from the Government. We found that those records were in a deplorable condition. A very considerable portion of the money proposed to be added for general administration is going into the work of bringing the records up to date in the Land Department, and perpetuating those which are vital to land titles.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I should like to supplement what has been said by the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee in charge of this chapter of the bill and by the Senator from Oregon. The Senator from Arizona has covered these particular items in some detail. I have sent for the record of the receipts of the Bureau of Land Management, and I think the receipts are of such striking importance that they deserve a mention in the RECORD.

As the Senator from Arizona has said, the Bureau of Land Management produces revenue for the Federal Government. Several years ago Congress passed the so-called Taylor Grazing Act for the purpose of preventing overgrazing and of repairing the damage which had been wrought by overgrazing in the past. So that an appropriation for reseeding these lands is merely a part of the program of overcoming the results of overgrazing in many, many years past.

The total actual receipts of the Bureau of Land Management during the fiscal year 1949 amounted to $37,149,433.89.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the able Senator from Wyoming yield to me?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am sure the very able Senator from Wyoming does not mean to contend that it has been the Bureau of Land Management which is producing this $37,000,000. It has been the public lands that has produced it. The Bureau of Land Management has merely been a real estate agent managing the property and collecting the fees.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Oh, yes, the Bureau of Land Management has a great deal to do with the production of the revenue by the management of the leases and of the various holdings upon the public domain. For example, it would be utterly impossible to procure the revenue derived by the Government from the production of oil and gas and coal upon the public domain if we did not have an efficient Bureau of Land Management.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The question is whether we are not paying too much for the whistle.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No. I am sure if the Senator had the opportunity to examine the testimony adduced before this committee he would agree that we are not "paying too much for the whistle."

Mr. President, I was pointing out that the income in 1949 amounted to $37,149,000. In 1950 it was increased to $38,850,000. The best estimate submitted to us by the Bureau of Land Management—and these figures have not been questioned anywhere—indicate that in the fiscal year 1951 the revenue will be more than $44,000,000.

With respect to the appropriation dealing with forest management, that includes expenditures of various kinds to make available for the commercial activities of the country and the sale of public timber the forests which are on the area administered by the Bureau of Land Management.

The O. and C. timber sales in 1949 amounted to $3,532,000. It is estimated that in 1951 they will amount to approximately $4,000,000, or an increase of almost half a million dollars over 1949.

It seems to me that an appropriation of $75,000 for the management of these revested timberlands which are likely to produce a revenue of $4,000,000, or in excess of that, during the year in which the expenditure is to be made, is not at all out of line.

Other timber sales have increased from $331,000 in 1949 to almost $500,000 in 1950, and it is estimated that next year we shall have an increase of $600,000.

I assure the Senator from Illinois that if he had searched for a place in which his argument for a reduction was less likely to apply than in any other place in the bill, he has found it when he has tackled the Bureau of Land Management.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I can appreciate the Senator's argument but feel that the increase of $541,000 over last year already allowed by the House should be sufficient. I therefore hope the committee increase will be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 235, line 22.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next committee amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was on page 236, line 1, after the word "Management", to insert a colon and the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That of the appropriations herein made in connection with the Revested Oregon and California Railroad and reconveyed Coos Bay Wagon Road grant lands, expenditures may be made for weed control on such lands, including those under cooperative weed-control agreements with the State and counties.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Construction," on page 236, line 14, after the word "expended", to strike out "$600,000" and insert "$800,000."

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, in the fiscal year 1949–50 no direct appropriation was made for this purpose, but a contract authorization of $200,000 was approved. The House bill provided for an appropriation for the coming year of $600,000, of which $200,000 was for the liquidation of the prior contract authority, leaving $400,000 in new money. The House appropriation therefore doubled the volume of last year's operation. The Senate ups this figure by $200,000, thus nearly trebling last year's figures.

In view of the fact that the House figure already doubled last year's figure, I think the amendment should be rejected.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the access roads enable the Government to secure a higher price for its stumpage. If we do not build access roads into the forests, then the large lumber companies that can afford to build roads make a low bid for the timber in the area, and that figure is all the Government gets from the stumpage. Whereas with construction of access roads, the increased price for the timber as a result of competition between the different buyers, enables the Government to make money out of the transaction. If there is in this bill a money-making provision, designed to put more money into the Treasury, it is in this item. I should like to remind the Senator from Illinois that there are two ways of balancing the budget. One is to cut expenditures and the other is to bring more money into the Treasury.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that there seems to be no way of solving this question; there are not two ways, there seems to be no way of doing it.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, with respect to this particular item I should like to say to the Senate that here and there over the United States the Government is in business, as distinguished from its primary duty and obligation of governing. This is a case where the Government stands in the shoes of private ownership. It is managing, operating, and selling timber on a vast area of approximately 2,400,000 acres. This is a large area of timber land, much of it still untouched, so far as cutting is concerned. It is in a very mountainous area, which is inaccessible except as roads are built, and they are very expensive to build because of the mountainous terrain. Unless access roads can be built much of the timber will not be sold. We will not get money for it, but we will lose it, because it will go the way of all over-mature timber, through rot, insect pest, windfalls, and the like. The building of access roads into these areas is a sound business approach to the management problem. The private owners who have vast holdings build access roads; they build many more miles of such roads per section than the Government has ever dreamed of building. The private owners do so because it is sound business and a good investment.

The Government seeks each year to add a few miles to its access roads program. It loses no money by doing so, for it is repaid by means of the increased stumpage value of the timber which is brought out, which, by the way, Mr. President, returns an annual profit to the United States Treasury. Furthermore, the access roads permit of management looking toward the regrowth of the forests, so that timber can be harvested again, and so that finally a complete reproduction stand of timber will be developed, and will be there for our children and their children. So it is a sound investment and is good business.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CORDON. I am happy to yield.

Mr. KILGORE. Is it not also a fact that the building of the access roads enables the smaller, independent producers of timber to bid on the Government stumpage; and, therefore such roads are an aid to small business?

Mr. CORDON. There can be no question at all about that. Although there are not many what we would call big-business lumber enterprises in that particular area, there are many which are very small, many which have no privately owned timber, but which depend for their operations upon Government timber. This type of access road will aid them and will increase the number of bids; and when the number of bids is increased, the price on the bids goes up.

Mr. KILGORE. I should like to ask one other question. I think the Senator is well aware of this matter. Is it not a fact that timber which has passed maturity is not the best timber? In other words, when timber reaches maturity, that is the time to cut it, and if it is not cut then, we run the risk of losing the timber. Is that not true?

Mr. CORDON. There can be no question about that. Mature timber is not subject to deterioration for a considerable number of years after it reaches maturity, but it is more susceptible than is thrifty, growing stock. Once it starts going downhill, it deteriorates rapidly, and every dead tree is a menace to thousands of live trees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 236, in line 14.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Administrative provisions," on page 237, line 4, after the word "title", to strike out the following provisos:

Provided, That of appropriations herein made for the Bureau of Land Management expenditures in connection with the revested Oregon & California Railroad and reconveyed Coos Bay Wagon Road grant lands shall be reimbursed from the 25 percent referred to in section c title II, of the act approved August 28, 1937, of the special fund designated the "Oregon and California Land Grant Fund" and section 4 of the act approved May 24, 1939, of the special fund designated the "Coos Bay Wagon Road Grant Fund": Provided further, That no part of such appropriations shall be available for expenditure in connection with such lands in excess of such reimbursements during the current fiscal year.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That of appropriations herein made for the Bureau of Land Management, expenditures in connection with the revested Oregon & California Railroad and reconveyed Coos Bay Wagon Road grant lands for payment of current expenses in connection with the management of such lands of a type paid from the separate appropriation heretofore made in connection with such lands shall be reimbursed from the 25 percent referred to in section c, title II, of the act approved August 28, 1937, of the special funds designated the "Oregon and California Land Grant Fund" and section 4 of the act approved May 24, 1939, of the special fund designated the "Coos Bay Wagon Road Grant Fund": Provided further, That no part of such appropriations for such current expenses shall be available in excess of such reimbursements for the current fiscal year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Range improvements," on page 238, line 11, after the word "received", to insert "(not to exceed $350,000)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Payments to States (proceeds of sales)," on page 238, line 19, after the word "lands", to insert "and materials"; and in line 22, after the word "receipts", to insert "(not to exceed $20,000)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Payment to Oklahoma," on page 239, line 8, after the word "received", to insert "(not to exceed $4,000)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Leasing of grazing lands," on page 239, line 16, after the word "receipts", to insert "(not to exceed $6,000)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Payments to States (grazing fees)," on page 239, line 22, after the word "received", to insert "(not to exceed $300)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Indian Affairs—health, education, and welfare services," on page 240, line 14, after the word "lands", to insert "research among mixed Indians and non-Indian groups including cooperation in medical research of benefit to Indians."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 240, in line 19, after the word "festivals", to strike out "$37,929,000" and insert "$40,252,328."

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I can appreciate the desire of both the House committee and the Senate committee to improve the welfare of the Indians. I think we all owe a debt to the Indians, and I commend the House committee and the Senate committee for their desire to help them.

However, I should like to point out that in the current fiscal year the appropriation for the health and welfare of the Indians is $32,535,000.

The amount carried in the House version of the bill, therefore, is an increase of approximately $5,400,000 over the appropriation for the present fiscal year.

The proposal of the Senate committee is to make a further increase of approximately $2,325,000.

Mr. President, it seems to me that we are making proper progress in our care of the Indians.

In view of the present international situation, despite my natural sympathies for this program, I believe we should slow down the rate of increase in the provision of such funds. Probably it hurts me more to propose this amendment than it hurts anyone else in the Senate. It pains me exceedingly. However, I submit that an increase of $5,400,000 over last year's appropriation is sufficient.

Therefore, Mr. President, much as it distresses me to make this request, nevertheless in the interest of economy and of conserving our resources for the difficult international situation, I hope the chairman of the subcommittee will be filled with compassion and will withdraw the committee amendment, and will accept the munificent amount proposed by the House, namely, $37,929,000.

I await the generosity of the chairman of the subcommittee in this matter.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I am sorry, but I cannot follow the Senator's reasoning.

In the first place, we were compelled to restore the amount for the California Indians, which everyone agrees should be done. We restored funds for California Indians on the same basis as funds were allowed for Indians in other States. The House had deleted $1,286,883 for California Indians.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is the item for the California Indians over $1,000,000?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Would the Senator then compromise on a figure to be made up of the amount of the appropriation as voted by the House of Representatives plus the amount required to care for the California Indians? I should be very happy to agree to that, even though I should think that the five million four hundred thousand already granted by the House should be enough to cover this situation.

Mr. HAYDEN. There was another item which was not properly accounted for by the House of Representatives, in the judgment of our committee.

The Senator, as an educator, will agree with me, I am sure, that the best way to teach the Indian children the English language and to become participating American citizens is to enable them to associate with other children on the playgrounds of public schools. I am sure the Senator from Illinois will agree as to that, namely, that if an Indian child can be sent to a public school, where he can play on the playground with white children, he will learn more than he will learn in any other way the lessons which will teach him to become an American. That has been demonstrated over and over again by the failure of day schools on the Indian reservations and the failure of boarding schools to bring the Indian children into accord with American ideas so that they can become a part of our civilization.

In order to meet the requirements of the States with respect to providing for the need in the case of Indian children attending public schools, it is necessary to increase this appropriation above the amount voted by the House of Representatives. The House of Representatives did not allow sufficient to meet the pending contracts with the States for payments for Indian children in the public schools. That item accounts for $326,000 of this increase.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then would the Senator settle for the increased cost for the California Indians plus the increased cost of taking care of the boarding-school Indians? I still think that a $5,400,000 increase should be enough, but I shall not be unreasonable.

Mr. HAYDEN. When I state the third reason for making the increase, I think the Senator will agree that the increase should be made. The committee included $400,000 for public-assistance payments to other than Navajo and Hopi Indians in Arizona and New Mexico, which is the same as the amount appropriated for 1950 for this purpose. In the absence of this item in this bill, there is no other provision for these Indians who are in need of public assistance.

Furthermore, the Congress passed an act increasing the amounts of money to be made available to Navajo and Hopi Indians for their education, their welfare, and rehabilitation generally.

In this appropriation bill, however, the Senate committee has not voted to allow the full amount of money requested for 1951 to start carrying out the Navajo-Hopi authorization of last year; but the committee did increase the amount above that allowed by the House of Representatives in order to meet that new authorization passed by Congress last year.

Those are the three reasons why the increase should be made. All those reasons are sound and proper, and they should meet with the approval of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Not only is the policy sound, and not only is the item sound, but the committee was most conservative in approving the item as it appears in the bill as reported by the committee.

I wish the Senator from Illinois would understand what is behind this particular item. I am sure he would if he would only investigate the situation and would study the evidence adduced before the committee.

If there is one item that is worthy of consideration in connection with this particular bill, it is this item. The Indians can not take care of themselves in the way that the Senator from Illinois can take care of himself.

Of course, the Indian is called upon to go to work, and he is drafted, and of course he can raise the flag on Iwo Jima; but then we complain because he is helped by a small amount of money.

I think that if the Senator from Illinois would investigate the situation which exists among the Indians he would be as enthusiastically in favor of the pending amendment as is any member of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 240, line 19.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Resources management," on page 241, line 6, after the word "exhibits", to strike out "$10,542,000" and insert "$10,814,576."

The amendment was agreed to.

E. I. DU PONT DE NEMOURS & CO.'S RELATIONS WITH SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, I am rather reluctant to take a few minutes of the time of the Senate when the general appropriation bill for 1951 is under consideration, but I have a few words I should like to have the Members of this distinguished body hear.

As the Senate well knows, Mr. President, I have always been opposed to outright monopoly which tends to stifle competition among small enterprises. As a small businessman myself, I am well aware of how much these modest-sized organizations have contributed to the growth and development of our great free enterprise system. The continued existence of American business is the economic lifeblood of the United States. Surely we all recognize that fact, and, as part of our responsibilities here, the Congress has from time to time taken steps to assist small business through the extension of loans and other services.

The terms "small business" and "large business" are somewhat relative. Arbitrarily, we may say a business is small if its assets do not exceed, say, $25,000. It is a large business, perhaps, if its holdings total a million dollars. No doubt some would use other figures in making this comparison.

In my State of Delaware, we have businesses of all sizes—hundreds of them—stretching from one end of the State to the other. In the city of Wilmington, which some choose to call the chemical capital of the world, there are located the main offices of E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co. This organization, which started many years ago from a very modest and humble beginning on the banks of the Brandywine River, has grown to be one of the largest chemical companies in the Nation. Its assistance, incidentally, to the United States Government, particularly in times of emergency, has been especially notable. This was clearly shown in the field of atomic energy. The du Pont Co. played a tremendous part in the successful development of the atomic bomb. Since then, I believe, it has withdrawn from endeavors along that line because of the fact that its work is primarily in the field of chemistry.

In the present emergency, I am sure the company's facilities and its personnel stand ready at any time for a call by the Government.

However, Mr. President, I am not making these brief remarks to cite the du Pont Co.'s war record or to heap praise on its many contributions to better living. What I do want the Senate to know about is an incident concerning the operations of the du Pont Co. and its relation to small-business organizations which came to my attention within the past week.

As everyone knows, cellophane, developed and manufactured by du Pont, is one of the greatest single contributions for the preservation and sanitary safekeeping of foods and dozens of other commodities that has ever been developed. Cellophane is a byword among American housewives, many of whom would not think of purchasing food products, particularly, which are without its protection. The development of cellophane was hailed as an accomplishment of tremendous proportions when it was first successfully produced. Manufacturers throughout the country who make and market scores of products leaped at the opportunity to enhance the appearance and to insure the protection of their goods by packaging them in cellophane. As a result, the sales of cellophane increased, and its demand became more and more widespread.

A few years ago, the du Pont Co., which had foreseen this increased demand, proposed to increase its cellophane producing capacity in order to take care of the expanding market. It went ahead with preliminary plans, estimates, and the investigation of plant sites. All this was well under way when the Department of Justice, in December 1947, brought suit against the company, charging that its position in the cellophane business constituted a monopoly. As a result, the company considered it unwise to proceed with its expansion program.

I want it clearly understood, Mr. President, that I am taking no position with respect to either the charges of the Department of Justice or the countercharges of the du Pont Co. in this case. I feel that since this matter is now before the courts, it would be improper for me to take a stand, even if I were inclined to do so.

In any event, the situation in which the du Pont Co. found itself with respect to the production of cellophane, as a result of this suit, was quickly reflected throughout the country as the demand for cellophane continued and the supply became short.

I now cite the incident to which I referred in my remarks a few moments ago.

There is a business in Gloucester, Mass., known as the Davis Fisheries. This company, I understand, puts out fish products and proposes to wrap them in cellophane. In order to obtain the various cellophane sheets that it required, the company endeavored to purchase for its needs through the du Pont Co. I learned through the office of the distinguished majority leader of the United States House of Representatives that a company representative was desirous of contacting a person of authority in the du Pont Co. with whom to discuss the buying of cellophane. I was pleased to suggest to the majority leader, for the information of his constituent, that I would contact the du Pont Co. and ask that one of its salesmen call on the Gloucester businessman to discuss the matter. When I did, however, the du Pont Co. informed me that though it would be glad to send a representative to talk over the Davis Fisheries' needs, I was advised that the current situation with respect to the availability of cellophane was not hopeful, and when I asked why, the company explained the situation, which I have just recited.

Mr. President, as I have said, I deplore the existence of monopolies of any kind when their operation stifles competitive enterprise. But I ask the Senate if it is fair to penalize the operations of this New England company and scores of others by making it so difficult for them to buy a product which is almost essential for the profitable operation of their business.

It may appear that the Government did not force the du Pont Co. to suspend its plans for enlarging cellophane facilities, but certainly the threat of the Justice Department's lawsuit has amounted to virtually the same thing.

Cellophane is now in short supply. Demands cannot be met, and prospective buyers of this product are forced to make out as best they can without it.

I might say further that the du Pont Co. has endeavored equitably to allocate the supply of cellophane which is currently being produced. In addition, the company has actively sought to interest others in the manufacture of cellophane in order that additional supplies will be available to the trade as soon as possible. However, it required more than a year and a half to find a company willing and able to invest the large amount of capital—approximately $20,000,000—which was necessary to enter the field on an economically efficient basis. At the present time, construction is under way on a new cellophane plant, designed and being built by du Pont for Olin Industries, Inc., in North Carolina. It is to have an initial capacity of approximately 33,000,000 pounds annually. All du Pont cellophane patents and know-how are being made available to this company. It is hoped that this plant will be in production by the middle of next year. I am sure Senators will agree with me that these are rather extreme steps for the company to take in increasing the available supply of cellophane.

It therefore seems to me, Mr. President, that at a time when our capitalistic system and the democratic way of life is being so ruthlessly challenged, we should encourage rather than restrict the continued activities of American business, both small and large.

A company is not good or bad merely because of its size. Its right to exist, and to manufacture and sell its products can most properly be determined by the American people themselves. The developments in the field of chemistry by the du Pont Co. and others have resulted in the creation of goods which have found world-wide acceptance. Cellophane is just one. In adidtion, there are nylon, orlon, and countless others. In my opinion, if the du Pont Co., or any other company, manufactures a product which is needed and accepted so universally as is cellophane, I feel it should be allowed to do so without being charged with monopolistic practices. American consumers and American business want chemical products and they want them now.

I should like to say that the cost of cellophane has been reduced in price several times since its first appearance on the market. It is my opinion that this does not seem to substantiate the charges of fixing prices at higher and higher levels which is usually attributed to monopolies.

I ask, therefore, Mr. President, why this company, or any other, should not be allowed to fulfill the desires of its potential customers?

GENERAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1951

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7786) making appropriations for the support of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'MAHONEY in the chair). The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Construction," on page 241, line 13, after the word "expended", to strike out "$22,422,000" and insert "$23,635,151"; in line 18, after the word "exceed", to strike out "$2,500,000" and insert "$5,000,000", and in the same line, after the amendment just above stated, to insert a colon and the following provisos:

Provided, That no part of the sum herein appropriated shall be used for the acquisition of land within the States of Arizona, California, Colorado, New Mexico, South Dakota, Utah, and Wyoming outside of the boundaries of existing Indian reservations: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the acquisition of land or water rights within the States of Nevada, Oregon, and Washington either inside or outside the boundaries of existing reservations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "General administrative expenses," on page 242, line 14, after the word "offices", to strike out "$3,500,000" and insert "$3,644,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Administrative provisions," on page 242, line 24, after the word "exceed", to strike out "two hundred and twenty-seven" and insert "two hundred and fifty."

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, this is a further commitment for additional Government automobiles. Two hundred and twenty are for replacements, and thirty are a net increase in the total number. My general observation is that if there is any product of which the Government has an excess supply, it is automobiles. I have noticed that wherever there is a Government bureau there is a large number of automobiles. I do not always object to replacing automobiles that are truly worn out; I am even willing to add seven to the total, so that the hard-worked Indian agents as they go about their ministering tasks may have additional transportation. But why they should have 30 more automobiles I do not know. I shall probably be informed that this is the most meritorious item in the bill, and that to take away these automobiles will be striking a blow at the heart of "lo, the poor Indian"; but, personally, I hope we can hold to the House figure of 227.

Mr. HAYDEN. The budget estimate was not 227 but was 327. The Bureau of the Budget, after canvassing all of the recommendations made by the Bureau of Indian Affairs as to its needs throughout the United States, recommended 327 automobiles.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I may say to my good friend from Arizona that we have, naturally, a high opinion of the Bureau of the Budget, but members of that Bureau are human beings, like the rest of us; they breathe and move, eat, and drink. They are not superhuman. They are also Government employees. If there is one thing that makes a Government employee slightly lose his balance, it is the prospect of riding around in a big automobile. They seem to have an instinctive bias in favor of having more and bigger automobiles and more costly automobiles. Therefore the committee has done well to cut the number down to 250, but we should not make our standard the ideas of the Bureau of the Budget. I am willing to provide 7 automobiles, but I do not want to provide 30.

Mr. HAYDEN. There are 110 Indian jurisdictions scattered throughout the United States. They cover a vast area. We must realize that many of the automobiles which are now in operation have been in operation a very long time.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am willing to provide for replacements in this instance. That is not the issue between us. The question is the rate of growth of the governmental automobile family. I think we should place a certain restriction on the degree to which the family should be allowed to extend. Incidentally, I think it would be better if we had less expensive operation.

Mr. HAYDEN. There is a strict limit on the cost of automobiles. They are all of medium price. The only automobiles costing any amount above the medium price are those for Cabinet officers.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Did the committee hear testimony and determine the number, after going into the facts, and did it determine what was the right and proper number the agency should have?

Mr. HAYDEN. We took neither the number recommended by the Bureau of the Budget nor the number recommended by the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

These automobiles are necessary in the performance of the service, and are primarily for additional personnel provided for in the Navajo-Hopi long-range program of educational and health activities.

This item does not carry any sum for the purchase of vehicles, but stipulates the number that may be purchased from funds elsewhere provided in the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am not a member of this subcommittee and I have taken no part in its deliberations, except in a very general way; but I should like to say to the Senator from Illinois that he has a very wrong idea about the duties of an Appropriations Committee, and especially this particular subcommittee. A committee does not go off half-cocked. It takes proof from witnesses who appear before the members of the committee. The members of the committee go into the facts very carefully. They do not merely jump at conclusions. They do not guess, as perhaps the Senator from Illinois is guessing when he talks of what ought to be done and what ought not to be done. They hear proof. That has been done for 20 or 30 years. Upon the proof before them they exercise their best judgment.

I hope the chairman of the subcommittee will not undertake to compromise with the Senator from Illinois unless the Senator from Illinois brings some facts before him, rather than merely entertaining an idea that we might trim the budget on this small matter.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is it the contention of the very able senior Senator from Tennessee, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, that the Senate should accept without question every item as it is proposed by subcommittees and committees?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; not at all. However, I do say that the subcommittee ought not to be guided by the Senator from Illinois, who during this day has not suggested a single fact upon which the position that he takes can be sustained. The Senator has not heard the facts. I doubt if the Senator has examined into the question of how many automobiles ought to be given to this activity. In order that I may be certain about it I shall ask the Senator from Illinois if he has examined into this matter and has heard witnesses testify?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was not present when witnesses testified.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator know anything about it?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. What does he know about it?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think there is a general presumption——

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; we do not go on presumptions. We go on proof.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think that what we know as men we cannot pretend to be ignorant of as Senators.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, let me point out that the House of Representatives has provided for additional doctors, additional nurses, and additional school teachers on the Indian reservations. If the Senator will tell us how the additional doctors, the additional nurses, and the additional school teachers can go about their business with the same old number of decrepit automobiles, I wish he would do so.

Mr. DOUGLAS. In the first place, we are providing 220 cars as replacements. I am willing to provide something toward growth. However, it is a question of whether we should go overboard on this large additional number of vehicles.

Mr. HAYDEN. We did not go overboard on it. We allowed a reasonable number for the increased number of doctors, nurses, and school teachers. Is it consistent to provide new positions and not means of transportation for those thus employed?

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield for a question?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. LANGER. How many automobiles does the Indian Department have now?

Mr. HAYDEN. I do not have the figure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to put the figures in the RECORD. I have them here. I wish to support the position of the Senator from Illinois in opposing the committee amendment with regard to the number of automobiles to be provided for this agency. The Department of the Interior in 1933 operated with 1,481 automobiles. At the present time it has 4,433 automobiles. I do not have a breakdown for this particular agency. However, another increase is proposed. Therefore, I wish to join with the Senator from Illinois in protesting this continuous increase in the number of automobiles which are made available to Government agencies. I see no sense to it whatever.

We have, according to the Bureau of the Budget, 20,119 automobiles in use in the executive branch of the Government, not counting the military authorities. I think that is entirely too many cars. Each year the appropriations call for an increase. I think it is time we put a stop to it. According to the number of automobiles and replacements which have been authorized in recent years it would seem to me that these cars are relatively new and should be in good condition.

Mr. LANGER. As I recall, there are only 233,000 Indians. According to the report, at page 405, the Bureau of Indian Affairs already has 1,531 passenger vehicles. Some of them are 7, 8, or 10 years old, and it is claimed that they are no longer economical to operate. Does not the Senator think, however, that 1,531 cars are sufficient for that agency?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; they are not. We must remember that the cars must be distributed among 110 jurisdictions. Then we must remember that we have Indian boarding schools, as the Senator knows, and Indian hospitals. When we take them altogether, the total number is not too high, in my judgment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is there any reason why some of the people in the agencies in Washington should not furnish their own automobiles? Why should we furnish cars for them to drive back and forth between their office and homes?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is an entirely different situation. When an agent is out on the Navajo Indian Reservation, which is larger than the State of West Virginia, he must travel about to see the Indians. An agent may be out in the Sioux country, where we have large reservations. The Senator may make his argument with respect to the city of Washington, and it may be true that certain employees should not be provided with cars. However, that is not true out in the field.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In view of the fact that the Department of the Interior has approximately 3,000 cars more than it had a few years ago, why do they not move some of the cars from Washington into the field?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 242, line 24.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Tribal funds," on page 244, line 3, after the word "appropriated", to strike out "$2,430,965" and insert "$2,437,965."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 245, line 1, after the word "laws", to strike out the colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That in addition to the amount appropriated herein, tribal funds may be advanced to Indian tribes for such purposes as may be designated by the governing body of the particular tribe involved and approved by the Secretary. Any tribal funds advanced under this authority shall be reported to the Congress in the annual budget for the next succeeding fiscal year.

And in line 8, after the amendment just above stated, to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the acquisition of land or water rights within the States of Nevada, Oregon, and Washington, either inside or outside the boundaries of existing Indian reservations.

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment. On page 245, line 10, I move the following amendment:

After the word "Oregon", strike out the word "and"; after the word "Washington", insert the words "and Wyoming" and a comma. If the distinguished chairman of the committee will accept my amendment, I shall not discuss it.

Mr. HAYDEN. I shall be very glad to accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, several years ago a similar provision was inserted in an appropriation bill. It provided for the acquisition of land. I recall that it involved Arizona, New Mexico, and some other States. Does this amendment refer to that particular subject?

Mr. HAYDEN. If the Senator will look at page 241, he will find the provision which relates to the acquisition of land outside of reservations in Arizona, California, New Mexico, and other States. This provision relates to the acquisition of land within reservations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "General investigations," on page 246, line 5, after the word "expended", to strike out "$5,150,000" and insert "$6,500,000", and in line 6, after the word "which", to strike out "$4,400,000" and insert "$5,791,000."

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MAYBANK. I understood that at 5 o'clock, by unanimous consent, the Senate was supposed to proceed to the consideration of the nominations to the Board of Directors of the Export-Import Bank.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was no unanimous-consent agreement. The senior Senator from Illinois announced that he would make a motion.

Mr. MAYBANK. I merely desired to find out what the situation was.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, last evening I did advise the Senate that at 5 o'clock today I would move that the Senate go into executive session for the purpose of the consideration of the Export-Import Bank nominations.

I dislike very much to disrupt the consideration of the pending bill, which seems to be moving along very well. But these nominations are exceedingly important. The members of the Board of Directors of the Bank are serving without salary, and not much business is being done by the bank or can be done until these nominations are confirmed.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MAYBANK. I have no desire to disrupt the consideration of the Interior Department chapter of the appropriation bill, but I wondered if the Senator from Illinois intended to bring the nominations up after that chapter of the bill had been completed.

Mr. LUCAS. If I could have some assurance that it would not take too long, perhaps that chapter could be completed. I hope we may get through with the nominations in a couple of hours.

Mr. MAYBANK. I merely desire to ascertain what the situation is. I want the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Arizona distinctly to understand that I do not intend to hold up the pending bill, but I have a few remarks to make about the directors of the bank, against whom no one appeared in the committee.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'MAHONEY in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

The following favorable report of a nomination was submitted:

By Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

Maj. Gen. Philip B. Fleming, United States Army, retired, to be Under Secretary of Commerce for Transportation.

NOMINATIONS TO BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF EXPORT-IMPORT BANK

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the nomination of Hawthorne Arey, of Nebraska, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Export-Import Bank of Washington for a term of 5 years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will state the nomination.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Hawthorne Arey, of Nebraska, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Export-Import Bank of Washington for a term of 5 years.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon is recognized. The question before the Senate is, Will the Senate advise and consent to this nomination?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I rise to oppose the nomination.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield that I may suggest the absence of a quorum? I had an understanding with the minority leader that I would call for a quorum when these nominations were taken up.

Mr. MORSE. If the Senator makes the request in behalf of the minority leader, I yield.

Mr. LANGER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum has been suggested.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I wonder if the Senator from North Dakota will withhold his suggestion until I may ask a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota withhold the suggestion?

Mr. MAGNUSON. Just for a moment. Is it the intention that we proceed with the Interior Department appropriations when we are through with the executive calendar, or does the majority leader intend to move a recess?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], in charge of the bill, has stepped out of the Chamber.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I think we can finish with the Interior Department section of the bill in an hour.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, it is speculative as to how long it will take to finish this particular phase of the appropriation bill. The nominations before the Senate are important, and I served notice yesterday that we would proceed to consider them today. If the Senator from North Dakota, the Senator from Oregon, and the Senator from South Carolina do not take too long in the debate, we might get through with the nominations and finish with the Interior Department appropriations.

Mr. MAYBANK. I should very much like to proceed until that section of the appropriation bill is complete. If it is agreeable to the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from North Dakota, we could then take up the nominations. I merely wanted to ascertain what we were going to do.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I am sure that if we give the chairman of the subcommittee, who has charge of the appropriation bill, a bare chance, and do not bring in something else for discussion, we can get through with the Interior Department portion of the bill in 30 minutes.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I do not think that would be possible, because there are several matters in the bill which will take considerable time.

Mr. LUCAS. I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is the calling of the roll. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Gurney	Martin
Anderson	Hayden	Maybank
Benton	Hendrickson	Millikin
Brewster	Hickenlooper	Morse
Bricker	Hill	Mundt
Bridges	Hoey	Murray

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAHAM in the chair). A quorum is present.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

Mr. MORSE. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that I am sorry that the question of confirmation of the nominations of the members of the Board of Directors of the Export-Import Bank is brought up at this late hour in the day.

As the distinguished Senator from Oregon mentioned yesterday, the Secretary of the Treasury tells us that the Export-Import Bank has more or less discontinued operations because its directors have not been confirmed, and their terms expired on July 1.

I think the Members of the Senate know the nominees to those positions. They come from various States, and all of them have been endorsed by the Banking and Currency Committee.

So I trust that the nominations will be confirmed by the Senate very promptly, so that the directors of the Export-Import Bank can resume their work.

On the other hand, the Senator from Oregon has submitted a resolution calling for an investigation of the Export-Import Bank. I assure him that I shall welcome an investigation by the Banking and Currency Committee of the Export-Import Bank and any of its operations. Similarly, I shall welcome the appearance of the Senator from Oregon before the Banking and Currency Committee.

However, Mr. President, I do not think action on the nominations should be held up any longer, because the Secretary of the Treasury has advised us that no business can now be transacted by the Bank, in view of the failure to confirm the nominations of the directors.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, is a quorum present?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. MORSE. I believe that the record will show that I yielded to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MAYBANK. That is correct, Mr. President.

Will the distinguished Senator from Oregon yield further to me for a moment?

Mr. MORSE. Yes.

Mr. MAYBANK. Let me say that I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Oregon in yielding to me. I wish to stress the fact that unless the nominations of the directors of the Export-Import Bank are confirmed, the operations of that bank are stopped.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that I seldom differ with the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, on matters of principle; but in this instance I differ with him on a question of procedure.

I shall discuss the recommendation I have made as to how this question can be resolved. Depending on how that recommendation is handled, I shall or shall not discuss further phases of these nominations tonight.

Mr. President, I propose to continue my remarks uninterrupted for a time, in the interest of continuity and clarity.

I wish to assure the Senate that I do not enjoy being in the position in which I find myself this afternooon, because I have no desire to do an unkindness or an injury to a single member of the Board of Directors of the Export-Import Bank. I think there is danger that an injury may be done them even by raising certain questions which it may become necessary to raise here this afternoon. I preferred to raise these questions in executive session of the committee. That is where these questions should be raised. That is where the information which the junior Senator from Oregon seeks to obtain from the Export-Import Bank should be obtained. I want to keep the RECORD perfectly straight as to the procedure which the junior Senator from Oregon has followed on this matter.

Insofar as I have any personal acquaintance with any of the members of the Export-Import Bank, I like them personally. I may have some fundamental differences with them in regard to certain of their loaning policies and practices, if I am correctly informed as to what those policies and practices are. I have certain serious differences with them in regard to some procedure which I am advised they follow in reaching their decisions as to what loans should be made. But, so that the RECORD will be perfectly clear, let me enumerate now the steps which have brought us to the point at which the Senator from Oregon presently finds himself on the floor of the Senate.

These nominations were sent to the Senate on Friday, June 16, 1950. They were then referred to the Banking and Currency Committee. The committee held hearings on small business, previously scheduled, on June 22, 23, 27, and 28.

A committee hearing, scheduled to consider the Export-Import Bank nominations on Monday, June 26, was canceled because of a Senate Republican conference held on that day—at least, I am advised by a staff member of the committee that that was the reason for the cancellation of the hearing. I think it is too bad that the hearing was canceled; it is too bad that the hearing at least was not postponed.

On June 27 the members of the committee were polled regarding the nominations, and thereafter the nominations were favorably reported to the Senate, the same day, by my good friend the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK]. However, no formal committee meeting was held on the nominations.

Since the nominations were not formally considered by the committee, there are no committee minutes covering any committee action on the nominations.

The RECORD shows that on June 27 the junior Senator from Oregon offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation of the loan policy pursued by the Export-Import Bank of Washington and the loans made by such bank, with special emphasis on the loan policy pursued by such bank with respect to, and the loans made by such bank to, the countries of Argentina, Brazil, and Mexico, and private borrowers in such countries.

SEC. 2. The committee shall report its findings, together with such recommendations as it may deem advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later than January 31, 1951.

On June 27, when I offered that resolution, I commented at some little length as to the reasons why the junior Senator from Oregon felt that such a resolution should be adopted. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show that on that date the junior Senator from Oregon suggested that these nominations not be pressed for confirmation until there could be a meeting of the committee and the Senator from Oregon could be heard in executive session. I think that was a fair request. It was a request so fair that its granting should have been automatic. That is the first major point I want to state, Mr. President, because when any Member of this body, on a matter as important as this, respectfully requests, as I did on the floor of the Senate, on June 27, that he be heard in executive session by a committee, in order to discuss certain phases of the policy of the Export-Import Bank which he believes have a direct bearing on the nominations themselves, the request of the junior Senator from Oregon should have been automatically granted by the committee.

I want to be fair to the committee. It is true that at that time the Senator from South Carolina, the chairman of the committee, found it necessary—and I think for perfectly good cause and justification—to absent himself from Washington in order to go to South Carolina, I assume he left Washington in connection with the campaign which was then being waged in South Carolina. I have no objections to that. But, Mr. President, I think there were two alternatives available to the committee. It could have proceeded in the absence of the chairman, which I think the committee should have done in the interests of having hearings in executive session immediately. I have always had a feeling, and I still have that feeling, to a degree, that a great many of the problems which concern the junior Senator from Oregon in regard to the policies of the Export-Import Bank would probably be clarified in an executive session with the committee and the chairman of the bank, and that as a result of such executive session perhaps some determination could be reached as to whether certain policies of the bank, which I think cannot be justified, would be discontinued in the future.. But the committee, in spite of my resolution, in spite of the statement I made on the floor of the Senate, did not see fit to proceed with any committee hearing during the period of time when the chairman of the committee was absent from Washington.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I will finish my statement, first.

Mr. MAYBANK. I merely want to correct a misstatement of the facts.

Mr. MORSE. I yield. If I have made a misstatement, I desire to be corrected.

Mr. MAYBANK. I was in Washington on June 16th, the day the nominations were sent to the Senate. I did not leave until June 27th.

Mr. MORSE. The Senator has just returned to the floor of the Senate and did not hear the previous remarks of the Senator from Oregon. Had he heard them, he would know that what the Senator from Oregon said was that on June 27th, when the Senator from Oregon offered his resolution and made his speech on the floor of the Senate, the Senator from South Carolina was here then, but it was necessary for him to absent himself for a few days immediately thereafter. The Senator from Oregon went on to explain that he thought the absence was entirely justified. He means no criticism of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oregon will yield, I greatly appreciate what he has said about me, but I was called from the Senate Chamber by a newspaper correspondent, who wanted to ask me about something. I went out to discuss the matter with him. The only thing I wished to say was that it was on the 16th of June that these nominations were sent to the Senate. I called hearings. Nobody opposed the nominations. The nominees were endorsed by all the Senators from the States from which the nominees came. There were none from South Carolina. Among the Senators from those States was the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], who is in the Senate Chamber at this time. I wrote him a letter. He knows that. No one objected to the nominations. We held the hearings. No one came. No one appeared for 1 day. So I then asked the committee either to approve or disapprove the nominations. There was not a dissenting vote by any member of the committee. I merely want to keep my record straight.

Mr. MORSE. I want to do everything I can to see that the Senator's record is straight. Nothing has been said by the junior Senator from Oregon which in any way contains any error in regard to the record of the Senator from South Carolina.

I simply repeat, Mr. President, that there were two alternatives which faced the committee, neither one of which the committee followed. It should have followed one of the alternatives which would have given me a hearing on these nominations after I raised a question about them. I think that after the introduction of the resolution on June 27 by the Senator from Oregon and the statement he made on the floor of the Senate, the Banking and Currency Committee then and there should have proceeded or made arrangements to proceed in executive session to hear the junior Senator from Oregon before any vote on the confirmation of the nominations was asked for on the floor of the Senate. Not having done that, I say—and I mean no criticism of the Senator from South Carolina; I merely express a difference of opinion with him as to the procedure which should have been followed—that upon his return from South Carolina the committee then should have proceeded in executive session to hear the Senator from Oregon on these nominations before they were submitted to the Senate for a vote.

That is the position of the Senator from Oregon on this question. My good friend from South Carolina has advised us this afternoon that he can assure the Senator from Oregon that he will be heard in executive session of the committee. However, he insists that because Mr. Snyder, the Secretary of the Treasury, is urging that these nominations be confirmed now, for the reason that the Export-Import Bank cannot carry on its business until they are confirmed, and because they have been hanging fire since July 1, we should vote tonight on these nominations. He proposes that after confirmation the Senator from Oregon be given a hearing in executive session on the problems and points he wishes to raise. I cannot accept that offer, for the simple reason that I do not believe in locking the barn after the horse has been stolen. If the Senator from Oregon is to receive a hearing on this question, I think it should be a genuine hearing on the merits of the matter, in advance of confirmation of the nominations, because——

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. In a moment.

Because, Mr. President, if certain allegations which have been presented to the Senator from Oregon can be developed in committee by way of cross-examination of the Export-Import Bank nominees themselves, I want to say that we would have to have some assurance from those nominees that certain policies will not be followed in the future, before the junior Senator from Oregon could vote for their confirmation and before any other Member of the Senate should vote for their confirmation.

I now yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I did not insist that we vote tonight. The Senator knows that I believe in unlimited debate. I want to assure the Senator from Oregon of the fact that there was no request on my part to vote tonight. I have always been opposed to cloture. Some Senators have been in favor of it. I want the Senator from Oregon to know that I shall remain as long as he wants to stay here, but I would never vote to cut off debate.

I have deep affection for my very distinguished friend from Oregon, because we have served together on many committees and we have been together on investigations. Fortunately or unfortunately—fortunately, I think; the Senator from Oregon may think it was unfortunately—the committee reported these nominations to the Senate before the resolution was submitted by the Senator from Oregon and they were reported unanimously, after I had talked to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN], the senior Senator from New York [Mr. IVES], the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] and other Senators who represent the States from which the nominees come. We reported the nominations in all honesty and in the best interest, as we thought, of the Government.

The Senator from Oregon has stated that I said Secretary Snyder said certain things. The Secretary never talked to me about these nominees until a few days ago, when he said the Export-Import Bank's business was being held up.

I hope these nominations will be confirmed. If the Senator from Oregon wants any kind of a session held by the committee, I can assure him he shall have it. But I do not want to get my name tied up with limiting debate on the confirmation of anyone's nomination tonight.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I understand, as clearly as I can understand anything, that the Senator from South Carolina is opposed to limitation of debate.

Mr. MAYBANK. I have never been for it.

Mr. MORSE. I think the Senator missed my point. What I have tried to point out thus far in my remarks is that the hearings should have been held in advance of an insistence on voting on confirmation. The record is perfectly clear that I asked for such a hearing.

It is true, as the Senator has pointed out, that my resolution was submitted after the nominations were reported to the Senate, but it was only a few minutes after. As I explained to the Senator from South Carolina and certain other members of the committee, I did not receive until that day certain serious allegations in regard to policies of the Export-Import Bank and methods of conducting the affairs of that bank, which caused me to ask for a hearing.

So I simply repeat the statement already made, and move to the next point. Under the circumstances of the case, Mr. President, there is no parliamentary procedure in the Senate that would estop the committee from then and there saying to the junior Senator from Oregon, "The committee will hear you in executive session in advance of asking for a vote on the confirmation of the nominations." The reporting of the nominations to the Senate in no way established any parliamentary right or created any parliamentary barrier which prevented the committee from hearing me within the next few days thereafter, in executive session, in regard to these nominations. That is the procedural point I made. I simply say that, in my opinion, the committee, unconsciously, unintentionally, and inadvertently, is guilty of an act of discourtesy to the Senator from Oregon, because under the circumstances I think any Senator, as a matter of parliamentary or senatorial courtesy, should have been heard in accordance with such a reasonable request as I made.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. I want to say as chairman of the committee, and I think I speak for all the members of it, that if we were in any way discourteous to the Senator from Oregon, we apologize. We certainly did not mean to be discourteous to him.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, that is why I said that I know such a course of action would not have been followed intentionally by the committee. I may be completely in error and unjustified in feeling, as I do, Mr. President, that I was done an injustice, so far as ordinary procedural rights, which ought to be granted any Member of the Senate, are concerned. But I think the committee made a mistake in not taking up this matter in executive session in advance of the motion which is now before the Senate to proceed tonight to confirm the nominations. It is a matter that could have been discussed and cleared up within a few hours.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. Yes.

Mr. MAYBANK. I wish to assure the Senator from Oregon that the last thing the members of the Committee on Banking and Currency would do would be to show any discourtesy to Senators. We always welcome Senators to appear before the committee. I assure the distinguished Senator from Oregon who knows my feelings and affection for him, that we would never be discourteous to him.

Mr. MORSE. I thank the Senator for his kind remarks. Mr. President, the second point I wish to make is that even though the motion places me in such a position that I must make a decision either to proceed with the discussion on the floor of the Senate of certain matters which I would prefer to discuss in executive session of the committee——

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. Yes.

Mr. MAYBANK. I assure the Senator that if he desires to discuss the matters on the floor of the Senate I shall listen to him as long as he desires to discuss them, and I further assure him that, as chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I shall invite the directors of the bank, should their nominations be confirmed, to an executive meeting of the committee where the Senator from Oregon may discuss these matters, and I shall be there with him on any date he may suggest for that purpose.

Mr. MORSE. I understand the position of the Senator from South Carolina, and I appreciate it, although I disagree with the wisdom of the procedure he outlines. I think this discussion should be held in advance of confirmation, in order to determine whether the information brought out in such a committee hearing with the members of the bank may not have a very definite relationship to the question of whether or not the nominations should be confirmed.

To finish what I was in the process of saying as to my second major point, the motion for confirmation tonight places the Senator from Oregon in the position where he must make a choice of whether he should discuss at this time on the floor of the Senate certain matters affecting the policies of the Export-Import Bank, and certain loans which have been granted and certain loans which have been denied by the Export-Import Bank, or to withhold that information and discussion at this time, awaiting an executive hearing before the committee, which could be described as a hearing after the fact. At least that kind of discussion might cause some change in the policies of the Export-Import Bank after the nominations of these men have been confirmed.

What the Senator from Oregon intends to do, Mr. President, is to raise certain questions tonight and refrain from a public discussion at this time of certain information which he will raise in the committee.

First, the Senator from Oregon will make a motion that these nominations be recommitted to the Committee on Banking and Currency pending a hearing called by the Senator from South Carolina. The Senator from Oregon will keep himself available to attend the hearing whenever the Senator from South Carolina calls it. In my judgment, and in fairness to everyone concerned, I consider it to be in the public interest that the motion I make be adopted by the Senate. Therefore, Mr. President, I move that these nominations be recommitted to the Committee on Banking and Currency pending a hearing, to be called by the committee for the purpose of hearing the Senator from Oregon and anyone else who may wish to appear on these nominations. I so move, Mr. President.

Mr. MAYBANK. I disagree with my good friend from Oregon, because on June 16 we had a hearing, and no one appeared in opposition to the nominees. I took the trouble to write to every Senator from the States from which the nominees came. I do not think it is fair to the nominees to have their names recommitted. I merely wish to make that statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the Senator from Oregon submitting a motion to recommit the nominations en bloc? There is only one name before the Senate at this time.

Mr. MORSE. I want to send them all back, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to a motion to recommit the nominations en bloc?

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MAYBANK. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. MORSE. I do not yield for that purpose.

Mr. MAYBANK. I withdraw the suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. MORSE. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on recommitting the nominations en bloc.

Mr. MORSE. The parliamentary question which the Senator from Oregon wished to ask is whether the nominations can be recommitted en bloc without a unanimous-consent agreement, or must he move separately that each nomination be recommitted as the name is called on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon would have the right to move to recommit the first one, because that is the one which is pending before the Senate.

Mr. MORSE. In view of the objection——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would require unanimous consent to recommit them en bloc.

Mr. MORSE. In view of the objection to the recommital of the first nomination until such time as we can have a hearing of the kind which the Senator from Oregon has discussed, I shall make the same motion in respect to each one of the nominations as they are brought up.

Mr. MAYBANK. I have no objection if the Senator from Oregon wishes to ask unanimous consent to recommit them all. I think that would be fair. If one is to be recommitted, all should be. I do not object to his asking unanimous consent to recommit them en bloc, although I shall object to recommiting any of them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to recommit the nominations en bloc.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now before the Senate is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Hawthorne Arey, of Nebraska, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Export-Import Bank?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President——

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator how long he thinks he will take?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield for the purpose of permitting such a question?

Mr. MORSE. I am glad to answer that question. It will take me a minimum of 5 hours.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The answer is 5 hours.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I heard both the Senator from Oregon and the Presiding Officer. [Laughter.]

I should like to ask the able Senator from Oregon another question. It is my understanding that he is desirous of appearing before the Banking and Currency Committee in executive session to discuss these nominations with the various members of the committee. Am I correct as to that?

Mr. MORSE. That is correct. That has been my position since June 27, and was so announced from the floor of the Senate on June 27.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to ask a further question of the Senator. If he should be given a hearing before the committee, will it take him 5 hours on each one of the nominations after he gets the hearing?

Mr. MORSE. I should be willing to submit to the committee at a round-table conference certain exhibits which the members of the committee could scan with me. That would take less than 5 hours.

Of course I shall have to read those exhibits if I proceed with this matter tonight.

Mr. LUCAS. I simply desire to save time, if it is possible to do so. I am willing to help the Senator from Oregon, and I have conferred with the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee. He is willing to listen to the Senator from Oregon tomorrow afternoon in executive session of the committee, provided some time can be saved. But if the chairman calls the members of the committee together tomorrow afternoon, and the Senator from Oregon proposes to take 5 hours upon each one of the nominations, there is not much point in having the executive session of the committee.

Mr. MORSE. My 5-hour discussion on the floor of the Senate will be in regard to all of them at the same time. I may have seemed facetious in my statement to the Senator from Illinois when I said it would take me 5 hours to discuss this matter in a Senate speech, but let me say most seriously to him that I appreciate the courtesy of his attempt to reach an understanding on this matter. I think it only fair to say to the Senate that before or while the roll call was in process, on my motion, I had a discussion with the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from South Carolina, and it is my understanding—and if I am mistaken, they can correct me—that they are agreeable to a suggestion we made jointly in that conversation. As I recall the suggestion it was that the Senator from South Carolina call his committee together tomorrow for the purpose of discussing this matter with the Senator from Oregon, and that these nominations remain on the calendar and not be recommitted.

I mean it most sincerely when I say there are two things the Senate ought to do in this matter: In the first place, the record is perfectly clear that the junior Senator from Oregon asked for a conference with the committee on June 27. I think any Senator who asks for that kind of conference, as a matter of parliamentary courtesy, should have it extended to him. In the second place, I desire to discuss certain phases of this matter in executive session because, in fairness to all concerned, that is where any problems connected with this matter which can be cleared up ought to be cleared up.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Would it be in order for the Senator from New Mexico to make a unanimous-consent request at this particular time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A unanimous-consent request is in order.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I desire to present a unanimous-consent request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New Mexico for that purpose?

Mr. MORSE. I yield for that purpose, with the understanding that my rights are in no way jeopardized thereby.

Mr. CHAVEZ. That is correct. Inasmuch as the committee has reported the nominations to the Senate, and since it is the desire of the Senator from Oregon to discuss them for 5 hours, I ask unanimous consent that at 18 minutes to 12 o'clock tonight the Senate vote on the nominations, and that the Senator be allowed his 5 hours.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. WHERRY. Reserving the right to object, I should like to say that I am one who has been very diligent in attempting to clear these nominations through the Senate. I was under the impression that the reason they were held on the calendar was that a certain resolution had not received attention by the committee. I want the RECORD to show that it is perfectly agreeable to the junior Senator from Nebraska that the suggestion made by the majority leader prior to the pending unanimous-consent request is agreeable to the junior Senator from Nebraska, namely, that the junior Senator from Oregon be permitted in executive session of the committee to question the nominees or to question any other witness he cares to question. I think that is only a reasonable request.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President——

Mr. WHERRY. Just a moment. If that cannot be done, then I should certainly be glad to enter into a unanimous-consent agreement to vote at a certain time on the nominations. But I want the RECORD to show that, as far as I am concerned, I should be perfectly agreeable to complying with the suggestion made by the majority leader and the junior Senator from Oregon, that the latter have an opportunity to interrogate the nominees in executive session and that thereafter the committee report to the Senate.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I desire to ask the Senator this question: In the event the meeting of the committee is held tomorrow afternoon, could the Senate again take up the nominations at 5 o'clock, and vote at 7?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, before answering the Senator from Illinois, may I first address a comment to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ]. I desire to do that so there may be removed any doubt in his mind as to where the Senator from Oregon stands on his unanimous-consent request. The Senator from Oregon will object to that request and he wishes to say to the Senator from New Mexico that he does not appreciate the implications of the discourtesy contained therein.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President——

Mr. MORSE. Now, answering the Senator from Illinois——

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

Mr. MORSE. Answering the Senator from Illinois, the Senator from Oregon wishes to say that he has tried, as the RECORD will show, to be exceedingly fair about a matter which has a great many delicate angles.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. The Senator from Oregon has asked, now for days, to have an opportunity to discuss this matter in executive session. But let him make very clear to the Senate and to the Democratic side of the aisle that if what they want is a full discussion of this question on the floor of the Senate, I shall give it to them for about 5 hours—tonight. But I prefer not to do it. I have tried to be reasonable and fair about this matter; but if Senators do not want to extend me the courtesy I have requested, we will stay here until I finish my discussion tonight.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, it is now about 12 minutes to 7, and in view of the fact that members of the Banking and Currency Committee have gone home, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary of the Senate notify the members of the Banking and Currency Committee that we shall meet at 3 o'clock tomorrow afternoon to hear the Senator from Oregon. Mr. President, I request unanimous consent to that effect.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I have a unanimous-consent request to make, myself.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair believes that the Senator from Oregon objected to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. MORSE. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is now a unanimous-consent request by the Senator from South Carolina, which is before the Senate.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico objects.

Mr. LUCAS and Mr. WHERRY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield, and if so to whom?

Mr. MORSE. I yield first to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. I was under the impression that the Senator from Oregon and I were just about to have a meeting of the minds with respect to voting at 7 o'clock tomorrow or at any other time the Senator might suggest, in keeping with his position, with respect to the amount of time it will take to debate the matter.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, it is my judgment that after an executive session of the committee we could vote on these nominations within an hour after they are returned to the floor of the Senate. I do not think 7 o'clock tomorrow night should necessarily be the time at which to vote. I think we can vote on the nominations at 5 o'clock or we can vote at 6 o'clock.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. With that understanding, I am sure the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee will call his committee together tomorrow afternoon in order to hear the distinguished Senator from Oregon with respect to complaints. It does not require any unanimous-consent request. The Senator from South Carolina, I am sure, will advise the Senator from Oregon that the committee will hold a meeting, and we can make disposition of the matter without any unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. MORSE. I have no objection to voting at 6, at 6:30, or at 7 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. LUCAS. With that understanding, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when we reach the hour of 5 o'clock tomorrow we proceed to the consideration of executive business, to consider the nominations of the four men referred to to be members of the Export-Import Bank, that at 6 o'clock the Senate vote on the nominations, and that the time be divided equally between the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK].

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I do not think I shall object—this is a peculiar situation in the United States Senate. What is there so secret about any information a Senator may have as against nominations which have been favorably reported by the committee that the people of the United States should not know about it? Is it of such a grave nature that it is necessary to hold an executive session? What more is the committee going to find out that the people of this country should not know?

I did not rise in order to jeopardize the rights of the Senator from Oregon in any way, but I feel that if it takes 5 hours, if it is so serious that it takes that long a time to inform the Senate as to how bad or how good these nominees are, it is about time the Senate and the people of the United States know about it. Why hold a secret session? Why not tell us about it?

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAVEZ. In a moment.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senate is in executive session.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Yes. The audience in the galleries listens to us. We are in open executive session, and if the information is so grave that it requires 5 hours to tell us about it, it is time we listened for 5 hours. I object.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I am certain that the Senator from Oregon would not wish a secret session.

Mr. MORSE. I asked for an executive session of the committee in the first instance.

Mr. MAYBANK. Would the Senator from Oregon object to having an open session?

Mr. MORSE. I should prefer to meet with the committee in executive session and then let the committee decide after it heard me if it wishes an open hearing.

Mr. MAYBANK. I appreciate what the Senator says, that the committee can decide afterward.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, in view of the objection made by the Senator from New Mexico, I move that these nominations remain on the executive calendar so that the Committee on Banking and Currency may provide me with an opportunity to discuss the policies of the Export-Import Bank with the committee tomorrow afternoon, with the understanding that the Senate will vote on the nominations at any time starting from 6 o'clock p. m. tomorrow.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not press that motion. We can have an understanding that the names will remain on the calendar and that the Senator from Oregon will have his day in court before the Committee on Banking and Currency tomorrow afternoon, say, at 2:30 o'clock, and he can appear before the committee and give the committee the information which he has. I am not aware of how serious the information may be. If it is as serious as the Senator from Oregon says it is, I do not want it to be understood that we are going to hold a hearing in executive session. I make that suggestion only because I do not want the Democratic Party to be put in a false light.

Mr. MORSE. I assure the Senator from Illinois that I shall summarize the position I take in the committee meeting tomorrow because I have no intention of putting the Democratic Party in a false light and there is nothing in what I have to say to the committee which will put the Democratic Party in a false light.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator can summarize the situation, but it still leaves an inference of embarrassment to the Democratic Party.

Mr. MORSE. I think the Senator is entitled to know the general line of inquiry which the junior Senator from Oregon intends to pursue in committee. I have already covered it in my speech of June 27 on the floor. It goes to the question of the criteria, the standards, and the policies which the Export-Import Bank applied in granting loans to various nations, including particularly the Argentine loan about which I think the committee ought to ask certain questions before a final vote is taken on these nominations.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I think we understand each other as a result of the colloquy which has taken place. I think it is in order to move that the Senate stand in recess until tomorrow at 12 o'clock——

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senate is now in executive session.

Mr. LUCAS. I am aware of that. I have not yet moved a recess. I am exploring the situation a little bit.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President——

Mr. LUCAS. Please let me finish what I was trying to say.

At 2:30 tomorrow afternoon the Committee on Banking and Currency will meet in the hearing room of the Committee on the District of Columbia, adjacent to the Senate Chamber. Following that, at 5 o'clock or 5:30 o'clock, we can proceed with the nominations. The Senator from Oregon thinks it will not take more than an hour.

Before I move that the Senate take a recess until tomorrow at 12 o'clock, I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senate as a whole be informed as to what new evidence or new information was adduced at the committee meeting tomorrow?

Mr. LUCAS. That will be a matter for the committee to determine.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. We can hold a meeting of the committee in the committee room of the Committee on the District of Columbia at 2:30, with the understanding that any Senator who wants to attend may attend. Does the Senator from Oregon agree to that?

Mr. MORSE. I agree.

Mr. LUCAS. Does the Senator from Oregon yield the floor?

Mr. MORSE. I yield the floor.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I was going to ask regarding the other nominations, but so long as most of the Members have gone, it might be better to go through with the executive calendar tomorrow.

Mr. LUCAS. We shall go through with the executive calendar tomorrow.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, the majority leader made a statement which I think should be clarified. Is it the intention of the majority leader to take up contested nominations?

Mr. LUCAS. Not the contested nominations. Nominations which are objected to will go over.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Very well.

RECESS

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I now move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, July 19, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JULY 18, 1950

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art the gracious benefactor of all mankind, we thank Thee for this day which has come to us as a sacred gift, bringing with it glorious opportunities for service and tasks which challenge the consecration of our noblest manhood and womanhood.

We pray that Thou wilt mediate unto us, through Thy spirit, that divine wisdom and power which will enable us to see our duties and responsibilities more clearly, understand and interpret them more wisely, and perform them more faithfully and courageously.

We are daily praying that Thy special blessing may rest upon our President, our Speaker, and all the leaders and Members of this legislative body. Grant unto them that spiritual guidance which transcends the fallibility of all human wisdom and that strength which never fails or grows weary in well-doing.

Hasten the time when sentiments and thoughts of good will shall permeate the mind of man and the righteousness of God shall flow everywhere as a mighty stream lifting the nations of the earth into the loftier altitudes of peace.

In Christ's name we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ADDITIONAL EMERGENCY MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, during recent days since the Korean crisis arose, Members have frequently asked me about the necessity for additional funds for the Armed Forces. We have all been desirous of being of every possible service in this important matter.

Immediately after hostilities began in Korea, in my capacity as chairman of the Armed Forces Subcommittee on Appropriations and acting on the advice of the subcommittee, I communicated with the President and the Secretary of Defense stating that we were prepared to give immediate consideration to a request for additional funds to meet the emergency. I stated that we would promptly make all needed funds available, making this statement because I knew the attitude of the House. The President advised that the matter would have his attention and that we would be advised of any needed assistance. The Secretary of Defense made similar response.

I have no doubt that the House will approve the actions of the subcommittee.

It is against this background that the House will receive the President's message tomorrow and I have full confidence that all necessary funds will be promptly provided. I shall do all in my power to provide quick action. We have just been waiting to receive the recommendations of the Armed Forces in order that we might take action here.

A UNITED STATES MEDICAL ACADEMY

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, I recently had occasion to discuss with a friend of mine, Dr. Alexander Kaye, of New York City, a prominent surgeon, the problem of the shortage of doctors which exists in the country as a whole. In the course of our very interesting talk he called to my attention an article which appeared in the May 1950 issue of Medical Economics which proposed a Federal school for physicians; that is, a West Point of medicine, providing full training at no expense to carefully selected medical candidates to produce M. D.'s for Government service. I thought so well of this idea that I have this day introduced a bill to create a medical academy. I wish to call this bill to the attention and consideration of my colleagues.

Its purpose is to bring increased numbers of physicians and dentists into Government service, both in military and civilian capacities, thus gradually eliminating the shortage of doctors which exists in the Federal Government, and perhaps partially remedying the situation in the country.

Mr. Speaker, a United States Medical Academy may be the only way to insure enough doctors for Government service if civilian medicine continues to increase in amount and in its monetary rewards. Under the provisions of this bill, such an academy would insure a constant and regular flow of physicians and dentists into government after the graduation of the institution's first class. Even if it were unable to meet all the Government's needs, the academy's graduates could form the necessary core of a Government medical service.

The proposed legislation contains the following major provisions:

First. It creates the United States Medical Academy along lines similar to the Military Academy, the Naval Academy, the Coast Guard Academy, and the Merchant Marine Academy.

Second. Appointments to this academy would be made from all congressional districts, Territories, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and the Canal Zone, 8 from each State at large, and 132 from the United States at large.

Third. Candidates for admission would be at least 20 years of age but less than 25, graduates of a college or university or the equivalent, citizens of the United States, and of good moral character.

Fourth. The course of study would include the following subjects: anatomy, physiology, chemistry, hygiene, surgery, obstetrics and gynecology, pathology, bacteriology, and diagnosis.

Fifth. Graduates from the academy would remain in Government service for 5 years.

Sixth. All employees of the academy would be paid in accordance with the provisions of the Classification Act of 1949 and would be subject to the provisions of the civil-service retirement laws.

Seventh. The academy would have a superintendent appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a term of 10 years, and a Board of Visitors with prescribed pay and minimum duties.

Eighth. Certain other general sections are included to carry out the provisions of the act.

Mr. Speaker, I am hopeful that this bill will receive the approval of the committee to which it will be referred and the subsequent approval of the House of Representatives.

CENSORING OF WAR INFORMATION

Mr. CROOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. CROOK. Mr. Speaker, living in the greatest country on the face of the earth and knowing in these critical times that on the fringe we are confronted with ruthless groups of Communists with whom we are engaged in battle today, may I say that I am of the opinion we are entirely too free in divulging just what we are doing and propose to do in the arena of military activities in these critical times. Perusing the press and chronicles of the time and listening very carefully to radio reports, I am stimulated to believe that we are giving the enemies as much information or more than we are giving to our own people. Such practice is most detrimental.

Is it not about time to start censoring some of the information that is going out through the medium of the press and over the radio? It is something for us to think about, I want to assure the membership. North Korea and her supply forces certainly refrain from telling us and the world of their designed plans and movement of reinforcements.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts was given permission to address the House for 2 minutes today, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

COORDINATION OF CIVILIAN DEFENSE

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have been so much disturbed at what I believe to be a lack of coordination in civilian defense that I am today introducing a bill which would create an agency and a head thereof for Federal National Civilian Defense which would report directly to the President. There seems to be no head today. It is under the War Resources Board but there is no central office for leadership and guidance for control, although I do not like the word "control."

There should be a guiding and leading center created very much as the Red Cross operates. I have heard it stated that more has not been done about civilian control because of the war hysteria that might arise. The Red Cross takes care of disasters and is all geared and ready to go when we have a hurricane or great fire or other disaster. We ought to do the same thing for civilian defense today. It should be a continuing agency just as is American Red Cross. This should be done and done at once. There is no time to lose. Soviet Russia has civilian control. England and Norway and other countries all have national civilian guidance and leadership of control.

PRIVATE CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. This is Private Calendar day. The Clerk will call the first bill on the calendar.

THE MERIT CO.

The Clerk called the bill (S. 1027) for the relief of the Merit Co.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

EXTENSION OF MUTUAL DEFENSE ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1949

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN], and now yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution makes in order the bill S. 3809, known as the Extension of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949. I shall not discuss the contents of the bill but rather confine myself to the rule.

Yesterday the Committee on Foreign Affairs appeared before the Committee on Rules and requested a rule waiving points of order and asking for a full day's debate. Yesterday afternoon the distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], asked unanimous consent that the House meet at 11 o'clock so that we could consider this bill in detail.

The resolution also provides for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

In view of the urgency of the situation at this particular time, I think this body should be given a full opportunity to hear the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, who have held a number of open sessions and a number of executive sessions on this subject. I shall, therefore, ask that the rule be adopted immediately.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARENDS].

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, we have been advised that tomorrow we will receive a message from the President of the United States. I do not profess to know exactly what the President will say in this message or all the recommendations he will make.

He will undoubtedly discuss the disturbing situation in Korea, the present inadequacy of our existing defense machinery, and he will recommend a sizable increase in appropriations for defense purposes.

I think I can say now that such a recommendation will have the overwhelming support of the Congress. Above all else, we are determined that our people have the best possible defense—a defense second to none—prepared to meet any emergency.

There is much that could be said about our tragic lack of preparedness as revealed by the developments in Korea. The Korean tragedy is not the fault of the Congress.

We have been spending around fifteen billions a year for defense purposes. It has been the Congress that has been insisting upon a larger Air Force. It has been the Congress that has prevented destruction of the Marine Corps. It has been the Congress that has repeatedly emphasized the need for supercarriers as mobile air bases, while some in charge of our defense have tended to scuttle the Navy.

At a later date I shall probably have occasion to discuss the tragedy of errors, diplomatic and military, on the part of the administration that has resulted in the costly Korean reverses.

In view of necessity of increasing our defense expenditures I rise at this time to emphasize again how important it is that we put our fiscal house in order to meet this emergency situation. It is imperative that we reduce the expenditures for other things. We need more roads, more dams, and improved harbors. All these various public works projects have merit. But, Mr. Speaker, they should be postponed.

The omnibus appropriations bill is still pending in the Senate. We can still reduce proposed domestic spending by at least $5,000,000,000 in order to meet these extraordinary defense requirements.

The greatest tragedy of all would be to destroy ourselves while seeking to defend ourselves. I cannot too strongly emphasize that a sound fiscal policy is as important to our national defense as men, guns, tanks, airplanes, and ships.

I earnestly urge a drastic reduction in domestic spending without delay. We must do it now, or it will again be too late and too little.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD].

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have just introduced a resolution calling for an investigation by the Committee on the District of Columbia into war-scare profiteering in the District. Certain bakers in the District of Columbia, and I am advised the same thing is going on in Philadelphia, New York, Chicago, and Boston, are raising the price of a loaf of bread 1 cent, for no reason at all. I am advised there is no justification of any kind for this conduct. It is an obvious and patent attempt by certain elements to take advantage of the existing emergency. This is the Nation's Capital. This is a good place for such an investigation to begin. It can serve as a warning to that element at any other place in the Nation or to any other business that might have the same idea. I hope the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia holds a meeting upon this resolution and acts immediately to crack down on this mob as of now.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GROSS].

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, throughout our history, some so-called Americans have made unconscionable profits out of war at the expense of ordinary citizens, including those doing the fighting and dying.

World War I made many millionaires. World War II, through cost-plus contracts, made more billion-dollar corporations and many more millionaires.

There has never been any excuse for this, and it is unthinkable today that anybody should profit from American blood now mixing with the mud of South Korea.

It is the duty of every Member of Congress and the administration to see to it that no more profits are made out of wars in which this Nation is involved. And this includes such high-sounding but nevertheless deadly operations as United Nations police action. Wounds are just as painful and our dead are just as dead under the flag of the United Nations as under the flag of the United States. Fancy phrases and slogans provide no consolation in battle, especially when United Nations ground forces consist only of Americans.

Mr. Speaker, the shooting started only 3 weeks ago, but already some prices are skyrocketing.

I call your attention to pork. For the week ending June 23, just prior to the outbreak of hostilities in Korea, the average price of butcher hogs at Chicago was $19.65 per hundredweight or 19.65 cents a pound, according to the Department of Agriculture. For the week ending July 14, the average price of butcher hogs was $24, an increase of 4.35 cents a pound. Can the farmer be blamed? Of course not. The farmer is the only businessman in the country who has nothing to say as to his selling price. He takes what the buyer is willing to pay.

Now let us follow the hogs through the markets. For the week ending June 23, 10 to 12-pound loins were selling at 45.70 cents a pound wholesale at Chicago, according to the Department of Agriculture. For the week ending July 14, the same grade pork loins had jumped to 64.40 cents a pound or an increase of 18.70 cents a pound while pork on the hoof was increasing only 4.35 cents a pound.

Meanwhile, what was happening in the retail market at the corner store? A Department of Agriculture survey of the retail meat situation at Baltimore, in approximately the same period previously mentioned, showed that center cut pork chops went up from 78 to 85 cents a pound, an increase of 7 cents.

There, Mr. Speaker, is the picture: Live hogs increased 4.35 cents a pound. Retail pork chops increased 7 cents a pound. Wholesale pork loins increased 18.70 cents a pound.

Who is getting fat in the pork barrel?

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I just want to call attention to the fact of what this increase means. Four or five cents a pound means a 20-percent increase, which is certainly unconscionable. That is a 20- or 25-percent increase where there is no reason for it whatsoever.

Mr. GROSS. The gentleman is right.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I am delighted the gentleman is calling the attention of the membership to these facts.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. D'EWART].

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Speaker, the hearings of the International Joint Commission on the subject of the division and use of the waters of the Belly and Waterton Rivers have been completed in the State of Montana and the Province of Alberta.

The people of Montana are hopeful that the Commission will lose no time in arriving at a just decision, based upon the testimony given at these hearings and the first-hand information gained from the Commission's field trip over the area concerned in both the United States and Canada.

I was fortunate to be able to participate in the hearing at Shelby, Mont., and have since read the transcript of the subsequent hearings at Havre, Mont. The individual citizens of Montana are to be commended for their frank and intelligent presentation of the need for this water to irrigate lands in Glacier, Toole, Liberty, and Hill Counties. Men of long experience in the area, including Senator George Wilson; P. R. MacHale; Douglas Parker, and John C. Hoyt, of Shelby; J. P. Seifert, of Conrad; Fred Mundy, of Gildford; Judge E. B. Elwell, of Havre, and many others showed the Commission, from their own long years of experience and their knowledge of the country, that the people of northern Montana are determined to put the waters of the Waterton and Belly Rivers, which arise in our State, to beneficial use on the excellent land of their region, and that such a program will add immeasurably to the development and the economic stability of the area.

I informed the Commission that this effort has the support of the Montana delegation in Congress, of which I was the only one able to be present in person. I spoke not only as the representative of the district, but also as a member of the Public Lands Committee of the House authorized by the chairman, the gentleman from Florida, to represent that body. I spoke also as a private citizen who has taken an active part in the development of Montana's irrigation for many years, and as one who has exerted every effort to save for Montana the first right to the use of the waters which arise in our hills and mountains.

In connection with the discussion of a proposed All-American Tunnel project through which the waters of the Belly and Waterton could be diverted to beneficial use in Montana, I presented the Commission with an exhibit showing a number of tunnel projects which have been constructed, both here and abroad, and which show beyond doubt that the All-American Tunnel could be built if necessary. At the request of the Commission, I am submitting additional evidence on these projects.

On June 15 I introduced in the RECORD the formal statement I presented to the Commission and the letters and statements forwarded by Senators ECTON and MURRAY and Representative MANSFIELD. I include at this time, as an addition to the above, the remarks of the Honorable J. Hugo Aronson, State Senator of Glacier County, who was Senator ECTON's representative on the field trip and at the hearings of the Commission:

REMARKS OF STATE SENATOR J. HUGO ARONSON

Mr. Chairman and members of the Commission, my name is J. Hugo Aronson and I am State senator from Glacier County, Mont. By way of explaining my presence here, I shall read a short paragraph from a letter which I received from Senator ZALES ECTON.

"Owing to the pressure of legislation now before Congress, it will be impossible for me to attend the hearings pertaining to the Waterton-Belly Rivers reference, and I therefore request that you attend the hearings as my personal representative. You are authorized to make such statements on my behalf as you find the situation warrants. I would consider it a personal favor if you could also participate in the on-the-ground inspection of the area involved prior to the holding of the first hearing."

As Senator ECTON's representative, I have accompanied the Commission on its inspection trip, and have learned with a great deal of interest something of the plans of the development of the flows of the Waterton-Belly Rivers.

I have lived in Montana since 1914, and spent many years in field operations until I entered my present occupation of farming. I have represented Glacier County in both houses of the legislature since 1939. At the present time I am in the senate. I am deeply interested in the future of this great State and want to do all that I can to save for the State a great natural resource, the water that it must have if it is to attain full development. This is especially true here in northern Montana where all available irrigation water is needed to develop the area to its maximum capacity, and at the same time to insure it against recurrent periods of severe drought. I feel that Montana has a just and prior claim to such portions of the waters of the Waterton-Belly Rivers as arise within its borders, and that its needs are valid and real if this great section of our State is to accomplish urgently needed development.

I realize that our Canadian neighbors need some of the water of these rivers for the development of their economy, also. But I have faith in their spirit of fair dealing to believe that plans of mutual benefit can be worked out between the representatives of both countries. However, I feel that we should not lose sight of the fact that the waters to be considered in such plans, according to the reference of 1948 as agreed upon by the Government, includes a large amount which arises in Canada as well as that which arises in the United States. Therefore, the fair plans of which I speak must make use of all of the water on both sides of the boundary and not just that of United States origin.

Otherwise, I feel sure that means can and will be found to put all of the United States water to use in the United States, and I believe that such a program might not be to the best interests of either of our two peoples. Five years have elapsed since the matter first came under consideration, and the Commission has had jurisdiction since January of 1948. It is felt that the Commission should arrive at an early decision.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FULTON].

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise this morning to ask a question. The Foreign Affairs Committee of this House finished action on the mutual defense assistance bill Tuesday of last week, July 11th. Many of us on the Foreign Affairs Committee felt that the program required immediate action. As you know, men and materials do not move immediately on the passage of legislation. So looking ahead to the future for 18 months or 2 years, long before which time this equipment will be immediately required, there will be a delay of 1 week in procurement of the whole program.

I would like to know from the Rules Committee, which is, after all, responsible to the House, why this vital legislation was held up a week before it came to the floor of the House for debate. Who is responsible for the delay?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULTON. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Can the gentleman tell us whether or not the appropriations that were authorized for the same purpose last year have been used?

Mr. FULTON. No they have not been used by the Administration. The trouble is that last year even when Congress gave its expression of opinion, the equipment, and material and defense weapons did not move. These required items did not move either to Korea or to China.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Who is responsible for that?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may use.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know, so far as I have been able to ascertain, that there is anyone opposed to the rule. The bill was reported out unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the rule was reported out unanimously by the Committee on Rules. I believe the membership wish more to hear the observations of the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs than those of the Committee on Rules, so I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 3809) to amend the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 3809) to amend the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, with Mr. MILLS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, debate is limited to 1 day, the time to be equally divided and to be controlled by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KEE] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS].

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, we have before us today Senate bill 3809, a bill extending the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, and authorizing appropriations therefor through the fiscal year 1951. Both the Senate Committees on Foreign Relations and Armed Services, acting jointly, and the House Committee on Foreign Affairs had before them for consideration during their hearings on this legislation an identical draft of the proposed measure.

The bill, following the general form of the draft, had been introduced in the Senate but not in the House.

Our committee intended to consider the draft, then mark up and pass the bill out of committee, and, following that, to introduce it as a clean bill.

We held many hearings, beginning on June 5, the same day the President's message to the Congress, urging the legislation, was referred to the Foreign Affairs Committee.

The committee held 6 open sessions and 12 executive.

The Senate committees, however, completed their hearings on Senate bill 3809, reported it favorably, and, on June 30, the Senate passed it unanimously—not a dissenting vote.

On July 3 the Senate bill was referred to the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

On July 10 the committee took up the Senate bill and considered it in the light of the mass of testimony presented at the several previous hearings.

On close examination, our committee found that the Senate bill was practically identical with the draft we had considered; in fact, it had been amended in only three respects, to wit, first, the so-called Taft amendment, which supplied a yardstick for the determination of the meaning of the words "fair value" as applied to reimbursable aid; second, an amendment authorizing the President, after consultation with the Atlantic Pact nations, to supply military aid on a grant basis to any other European country whose defense was deemed necessary to the security of the other signatories to the pact; and, third, the so-called Ellender amendment, authorizing the President to suspend all aid to any country failing to do its full share toward carrying out the MDA program.

The first two amendments had already been considered by the committee and had met with approval. The committee found the Ellender amendment unobjectionable.

In view of these facts, the Foreign Affairs Committee gave its full approval to S. 3809 as it passed the Senate, and reported it out without a dissenting vote—the vote in favor of the bill was 20 to none. The one member of the committee failing to vote was absent on a study mission to Central America, made on behalf of the committee.

S. 3809, the bill as it passed the Senate and as it has been reported to the House by the Foreign Affairs Committee, will authorize, for a continuance of mutual defense assistance for the fiscal year 1951, a total of $1,222,500,000 of new funds to be applied as follows:

First. For providing military assistance to the North Atlantic Treaty nations, including $75,000,000 for equipment and raw materials to increase military production in western Europe, and $12,000,000 for expenses of administering the entire act, $1,000,000,000.

Second. For equipment, materials, and supplies for defense of Turkey, Greece, and Iran, $131,500,000.

Third. For the Philippines and Korea, $16,000,000.

Fourth. For continuing and expanding the program now in operation in the general area of China, $75,000,000.

Total, $1,222,500,000.

It should also be noted that for the year 1950, there was appropriated for the MDA program the sum of $1,314,000,000. Of this amount, approximately $1,100,000,000 has been obligated for the year 1950, leaving a balance of approximately $214,000,000 to be carried over. This balance was fully considered in making up the estimates of the requirements for 1951. Therefore, this balance, together with the new appropriation provided by the pending measure, makes a total of $1,436,500,000 as representing the cost to the United States of the 1951 program.

In reporting this bill to the House, our committee report, beginning on page 57 contains a section-by-section analysis of the pending measure.

There were very material changes made in the basic provisions of the original act. A few of such changes might well be mentioned.

Section 3, amending section 104 of the existing statute, is a clarifying amendment stating more clearly what types of production equipment may be supplied. The amendment is designed to permit the stepping up of defense production on the part of the countries participating in the program.

Section 4 merely amends the heading of title II of the original act. It takes Iran from title III, where it had been placed in company with Korea and the Philippines, and places it with Greece and Turkey in title II. No changes of policy are involved.

Section 7 is a new subsection to section 302 of the act of 1949, authorizing the $16,000,000 for additional aid to Korea and the Philippines for the year 1951.

Section 8 also adds a new subsection to section 303 of the 1949 act authorizing an additional $75,000,000 appropriation for the general area of China. It also provides certain restrictions on the disbursement of the fund.

I might interpolate here. Those restrictions were merely on the manner in which the President disbursed this $75,000,000. The act of 1949 provides that the President could disburse the entire $75,000,000 without any invoices. In the bill under consideration a restriction is placed to the effect that of this amount the President can disburse $35,000,000 without such invoices, but of that $35,000,000 only $7,500,000 can be disbursed without notification to both the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations and the House Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Section 9: Under the existing statute, excess materials and equipment can be supplied in the amount of $450,000,000 based on the average original procurement cost of such equipment. The amendment would raise the amount that can be supplied by an additional $250,000,000.

Section 10: This section amends section 403 and provides for a carry-over until June 30, 1951, of any unexpended balance of the appropriation for the mutual defense-assistance program.

Section 11: This section amends section 404 and provides that certain authority granted to the President under a revision of section 408—to transfer funds from title to title and when aid should be granted under certain conditions to other countries—cannot be delegated by the President but must be exercised by him alone.

Section 12—three subsections—amending section 408 of the existing statute.

The original act authorized the President to transfer not to exceed 5 percent of the amounts made available by any title of the act to the purposcs of any other title. The amendment would increase this to 10 percent. The amendment further broadens the President's authority by enabling him, within the 10-percent limit, to aid any European nation whose strategic location makes it directly important to the defense of the North Atlantic area. Before supplying such aid, however, the President must consult with the other nations which are parties to the North Atlantic Treaty.

Another subsection authorizes use by the United States of local currencies for administrative expenses of the program.

The third subsection deals at length with the matter of reimbursable aid; it limits the amount of outstanding contracts to a total of $100,000,000 at any one time.

For the further information of the House, may I add that the following countries have signed mutual defense assistance agreements with the United States:

Canada—has not requested assistance, but is eligible; United Kingdom; Belgium; France; Luxemburg; Netherlands; Italy; Denmark; Norway; Iceland—has not requested assistance, but is eligible; Portugal—has not requested assistance, but is eligible; known as the North Atlantic Treaty states. They have an organization called the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. This is aided by a Council, composed of the foreign ministers of each member Nation. See chart, page 17 of the report.

Iran, Philippines, and Korea, have also signed bilateral agreements with United States.

Greece and Turkey: No new agreements necessary. Arrangements had already been concluded under the Greece-Turkey Aid Act of May 27, 1947, Public Law 75, Eightieth Congress.

Our bilateral agreements with the various countries are all couched in practically the same terms, and follow the requirements of the statute.

Mr. Chairman, this program has now been carried forward for 1 year. We had many witnesses before our committee, testifying that great progress has been made. Some objection has been raised to the showing by those who have been in charge of the program with respect to this progress, but it must be remembered that a large amount of the funds appropriated by the act of 1949 was withheld until the various countries which are participants of this aid had established in western Europe plans for a united and integrated defense, which plans had to be approved by the President of the United States. It took quite some time after the passage of the act for the preparation and adoption of these plans. It was not until January of last year that the plans were approved by the President for this united and integrated defense. More, the question of shipping, the question of organization, and all of the various problems incident to a great undertaking, had to be solved, but the showing has been a magnificent one, and the accomplishment great, as you will find by a perusal of the report of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

I recommend the passage of this bill without amendment.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, acting on behalf of the gentleman from New Jersey, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey, our beloved former chairman and now distinguished ranking minority member of our committee, Dr. EATON, 10 minutes.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I am deeply grateful to my distinguished colleague the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS] first of all for doing all the work today that I ought to do, and doing it better, and secondly for permitting me to say a few words at this point in the discussion.

I am, as usual, profoundly impressed with the unanimous interest of our entire membership in this most important international legislation. Judging by the number of vacant chairs here, it would indicate that we are prepared to go the limit in order to meet any circumstance that may arise in the world, good, bad, or indifferent.

I want to express my gratification personally as a citizen in the fact that we are now emerging from the moth-ball era in our history. Immediately after peace came a few years ago we put our Navy into moth balls. Then the rest of us went into moth balls mentally, morally, and physically, and in this moth-ball era our friend, Mr. Stalin, and his devoted followers have made hay whether the sun shone or not. Here we are again facing a tremendous challenge in the world. It would be folly for me to attempt to analyze this very important piece of legislation. It will be done so much better by abler men, and has already been done so well by our distinguished chairman.

I wish, at this moment, to pay a personal tribute to the chairman and to the members of our committee for the long and arduous and self-sacrificing toil they have given to the preparation of this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I think the time is here when everyone who possibly can will break through the mist and clouds mental, moral, and physical, which surround us and see the actual facts which confront us in this world at this moment.

I do not suppose in all history there can be found an instance where a great concept like communism, world-wide in its application, revolutionary to its methods, has been supported by so able and resourceful and unscrupulous and immoral a force as the present government in the Kremlin. The fact is we are face to face with a world situation which must be resolved either for darkness or for light. There is no twilight zone between. Either the tireless world-wide program of the Communists to conquer the world, including the United States, will have to be stopped, defeated, and destroyed at great cost, or we will have to surrender everything that we have inherited from that day long ago when—

By the rude bridge that arched the flood,
Their flag to April's breeze unfurled,
Here once the embattled farmers stood,
And fired the shot heard round the world.

That is what we have inherited—and we stand today facing the world as the champion of everything that we have inherited—everything we hold dear and everything that constitutes the hope of a civilized mankind.

This bill today, apart from its various provisions, costing us immense sums of money and immense sacrifice, must be considered as a symbol of that spiritual struggle that is shaping up in the world, in which the soul of mankind shall remain forever fettered and lost or shall be free and become once more clothed with the dignity that is worthy of the sons of God.

I cannot add anything to the situation. You know it as well as I do. We are exactly in the condition, speaking in the language of the farmer, of the rabbit that climbed the tree when the dog was after him. It is not our nature, but we have got to do it. Either we have got to pull down our flag, raise our arms and surrender, or we have got to stand up and fight. So I say today that this legislation, apart altogether from its actual provisions, its costs to our taxpayers, is a symbol, an announcement to the world that America is still on guard for the soul of mankind and for the freedom that has made life worth while down through the centuries.

Mr. Chairman, in spite of the difficulties of this hour, in spite of the uncertainties and sorrow and loss now facing us in Korea and elsewhere, in spite of the glacial advance of communism by every devil-inspired means possible, I take refuge, and I know you will, in the words of an inspired poet—

Truth forever on the scaffold,
Wrong forever on the throne,
But behind the dim unknown
Standeth God within the shadow
Keeping watch above his own.

And it is no claim for special virtue when we say, in all humility, that the ideals of our American civilization are in accord with the purposes of the Divine Creator.

Therefore, we might as well pass this bill without delay and get on with the next task that awaits us.

I yield back the remainder of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 18 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, we have already heard the details of this bill explained, and also the background and setting in which it should be considered.

It is my province perhaps to go into some other phases of it. For the first time in a number of years you have seen a bill come from our committee with no amendments. Our committee has a habit and practice of trying to improve whatever we receive but the bill that is before you is exactly as it passed the Senate. I want to explain the background of that unusual circumstance.

In the first place, this is simlpy an extension of an existing law and policy, with some minor changes made necessary by time and experience.

In the second place, in the consideration of this legislation, we had more cooperation from the State Department and the administration than we have had for some time. Officials came up and discussed with members of the Foreign Affairs Committee the problems that needed attention in this extension, and asked for suggestions as to how best they might be solved. We gave our suggestions and asked that they prepare a draft bill incorporating their suggestions and ours, and agreed that the committee would then consider that draft. That was done. When, therefore, the bill we now have before us, S. 3809, finally came before our committee it already contained a number of suggestions made by our committee to the administration officials and their staff that had been incorporated before it was filed in the Senate. Included was the floor amendment on "fair value" offered by Senator TAFT which represented the House committee views on this question. Thus we had a very short horse to curry. When this bill came before our committee, we could act on it promptly and without amendment; and we are not recommending any amendments here.

In the third place, another circumstance that perhaps made consideration easier was that the Korean aggression had changed things. I want to refer to that a little later. It has become perfectly clear that probably more money is going to be needed both for our own defenses and for mutual defense in the near future. In reviewing this with the State Department and the Armed Forces officials yesterday morning in our committee, however, they did not make any recommendation for increases in any part of this bill, but urged only that it be promptly considered and adopted in its present form.

I want to point out three things we ought to bear in mind as we consider this bill.

First, this is a Mutual Defense Assistance Act. As the great leader among the free nations we adopted in this act last year the policy of furnishing military assistance to other free nations "based upon the principle of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid * * * for individual and collective self-defense." Based upon performance up to date the Soviets have done better in arming aggressors than we have in arming defenders of the free—witness Korea. We have found out that when aggression comes, if the free people are not armed and are not ready to take their own part in mutual action in their own defense, the burden falls where? It falls squarely on the United States. Thus one of the lessons the tragic events of the past few weeks has made clear is that we on the side of the free must become more effective in mutual defense than the forces of communism are in the policy and practice of mutual aggression.

Second, and most significant, both the United States and the United Nations have looked through form to substance in this Korean aggression; they do not pretend that it is a mere civil war. That was the pretext used for doing nothing in China. Events in Israel, in Palestine, and in India in recent years have been recognized as having had the elements of civil struggle in which other governments should not intervene; but in Korea right after June 24, it was crystal clear that this was barefaced, inexcusable, premeditated aggression. Aggression by whom? By the 9,000,000 North Koreans against their southern neighbors, more than double their numbers? We look through form to the substance; we all recognize where the aggression is coming from. Nations larger than Korea have had bloody civil wars in recent years, without United Nations intervention. In spite of the diplomatic words used in United Nations resolutions and our official statements, 52 nations realize this is different. That realization is going to require some further thinking, and planning, and acting in the future.

Third, at last we have got a far eastern policy of sorts. We arrived at it the hard way, but we have got it, if we do not lose it.

I want to make a brief review of some of the events leading up to the situation in Korea.

Korea was recognized by the United States as independent on January 1, 1949. Korea was peculiarly the child of the United Nations, and peculiarly the child of the three great nations, the United States, China, and Britain, who joined in the Cairo declaration in 1943, then ratified the Cairo declaration at Potsdam in 1945, and peculiarly the child of the Soviet Union that ratified the Cairo and Potsdam declaration in its tardy declaration of war against Japan. But up to June 30, 1949, our Army furnished Korea's defense and our GARIOA funds—for Government and Relief in Occupied Areas—bolstered their economy. These funds lapsed on June 30, 1949, and at the same time our troops withdrew under the United Nations resolution for withdrawal.

From then on until June 27, 1950, the administration's amazing policies, statements, actions, and inactions can only be understood if we realize that up to June 24, 1950, they were following in Korea the Lattimore line, cynical, cowardly, and disastrous, but logical, once you grant his premises on Russia and China.

Here is what Lattimore recommended on July 17, 1949, in the Sunday Compass, successor to PM:

> The thing to do, therefore, is to let South Korea fall, but not let it look as though we pushed it. Hence, the recommendation of a parting grant of $150,000,000.

The Korean aid bill (H. R. 5330) that was before our committee at that time was for $150,000,000.

Here is what Lattimore recommended in his memorandum to Jessup in the State Department on far eastern policy in August 1949:

> South Korea is more of a liability than an asset to the interests and policy of the United States.

After urging no delay in establishing relations with Communist China, Lattimore wound up by recommending:

> The United States should disembarrass itself as quickly as possible of its entanglements in South Korea.

So the administration followed the Lattimore line. Although they had known for 6 months what was ahead, it was not until June 8, 1949, that they brought in H. R. 5330, a bill authorizing permanent economic aid to Korea, with $150,000,000 for the first year and $385,000,000 for the first 3 years. It had to pass, and appropriations implementing it by June 30, or there would be a gap. They knew this could not be done, they did not try to hurry the bill.

Our committee learned in executive session the things everyone knows now, that Korea could not defend itself against a Communist attack, that it was not part of our security perimeter, that there was no commitment or promise to support Korea.

We also learned of the dust-settling policy for China that was later developed publicly by Secretary Acheson.

The bill came out of committee. I appeared before the Rules Committee with a group of my colleagues and urged that no rule be granted. I said:

> If this bill comes to the floor, it will be defeated, but in order to explain it, some things must be said that will hurt Korea and the prestige of the United States in Asia.

I asked for an executive session of the Rules Committee and got it, and explained what we had learned.

The Rules Committee held up the bill until September 27, and the House leadership never let the bill come to the floor until January 19, 1950. On that day, as I had predicted, this $385,000,000 economic plan was defeated. During the debate on January 19 I said on this floor "It may be that in the future as we develop a new policy—Korea will receive aid under some mutual-aid plan, some far eastern plan that makes sense. I hope that day will come. But in the present state of our policy, or lack of policy, we should not vote money down the Korean rat hole that will not save them militarily, that we will not add to our military security—that will not solve their economic problem."

Then a Senate bill on Korea, S. 2319, was taken up in our committee. Every word of it was stricken out, including its title, and it was brought to the floor on February 7, 1950, labeled "The Far Eastern Economic Assistance Act of 1950," and extended economic aid to both Korea and Formosa until June 30, 1950.

I supported this bill because it kept Formosa going, by extending the China Aid Act of 1948 and with the hope we would arrive at a policy before the bill ran out on June 30, 1950. We arrived at that policy on June 27, 1950.

I said on February 7, during debate on this bill:

> This is a stopgap measure * * * It only runs for less than 5 months. * * * It is not strictly rat-hole money—in fact, it is not much of anything, but it seems to be the best we can do at this time toward getting this administration to make a stand against Communist aggression in the Far East. * * * I hope a real plan is developed by next June. At best this is a stopgap. At least it is a continuation of the bipartisan congressional policy for the Far East. At least it means Congress is not retreating in Asia.

That bill was passed on February 9, 1950, and became Public Law 447. Not 1 cent authorized by this bill ever got to Korea before the attack on June 24, 1950. The money authorized was appropriated in Public, No. 533, a deficiency bill, which did not become law until June 29, 1950.

There was $100,000,000 authorized for economic aid to Korea in the Foreign Assistance Act and $94,000,000 for China, including Formosa, and southeast Asia. None of this was available by June 24, the time the attack came. Korea got along on some stopgap appropriations made last summer and fall.

Meanwhile, military aid for Korea was included in the MDAP bill which passed the House on August 19, 1949. But it was obvious that $27,400,000 for Korea, the Philippines, and Iran was not enough to defend them against a real attack. The Lodge-Walter amendment providing $100,000,000 military aid and up to 500 officers and men to China and southeast Asia was defeated on a teller vote August 18 by 94 ayes and 164 nays. The best that could be done was $75,000,000 for the general area of China in the conference report September 28.

Once more, it was impossible to get into the law over administration opposition, any direct military aid to China, any positive policy of resisting the spread of communsm in Asia.

Now for some reason or other, information as to the amount programed for Korea under MDAP and the amount that got there is still secret. Obviously, it is no longer a military secret. However, I will observe that secrecy and put it this way. No one is now claiming that one dime's worth of the weapons or ammunitions programed under the Korean section of MDAP ever got there before the attack on June 24, 1950.

Now there is going to be political weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth about the votes on these Korean-aid bills, military and economic, for a long time, but amid the charges, hokum, insinuations, and lies, a few simple facts should be kept clear in Congress and in the public mind:

None of the economic aid involved in these controversial bills ever got to Korea before the attack; none of the military aid is claimed to have gotten there; no responsible witness before any committee ever claimed that the economic aid or the military aid requested would prevent an attack, or turn back a full-fledged Communist attack, if it did get there.

A number of Members of Congress were willing to vote for something for Korea anyhow; a number like myself were willing to vote for something for Korea whenever we could commit the administration to do something for Formosa at the same time, with the hope that we could hold the line until we got some sort of policy in the Far East; a number of others took a dim view of all military assistance so long as it did not provide any real plan for the Far East; but the administration, with millions authorized by a majority in Congress, followed the Lattimore line until the attack on South Korea of June 24, 1950. Our military intelligence can be criticized for not anticipating this attack; our diplomatic unintelligence from Yalta on, set the stage for a successful attack.

Then, in 48 hours, a revolutionary change came in our whole far eastern policy. We sought United Nations action on Korea, for Korea was not in our security perimeter; it was everybody's business, an international police problem; the palsied United Nations came to life and responded magnificently, and acted promptly. The President at last stood firm on Formosa, and the Philippines and Indochina, and the country was united. It took all of this to unite our country. It will take all of it to keep us united. There are faint-hearted souls here and in the United Nations who do not yet see that Korea and Formosa are both United Nations problems. We must lead in making them realize that the same kind of appeasement brings the same kind of aggression everywhere, and that the forces of the free must stay united to resist aggression anywhere. The international posse that is gathering to stop aggression in Korea must hold together to meet and stop and turn back Communist aggression wherever it starts; if necessary, at the place where it is plotted and planned.

This is right, and we must have faith that right makes might. I realize the free people are deficient in arms right now. We probably have the advantage in atomic weapons, but we hate to use them. We will probably have to provide more money for our mutual defense than is authorized by this bill, and take that action soon. By our action today, however, we will show the world that we are united in mutual defense assistance; not behind the President, not against the President, but shoulder to shoulder with the United Nations of the free.

As I look through the fog of war over Korea I become discouraged, and I am terrified and I shudder at the possibilities for suffering and degradation and despair that lie ahead of us if we fail; and then I see the free people of the world getting together some way or other with just one clear determination, that we are going to stop this thing and we are going to revive and maintain peace on earth among men of good will; I see white and colored fighting shoulder to shoulder in a common cause, and more coming, as policemen for a united free world and I see the glory of it if we do not fail; not glory for our side, but a greater glory. I wonder if you see it. I wonder if you ever feel as I do as you look through the fog of war over Korea and at what is happening there and all over the world. I feel—

> Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord;
> He is trampling out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored;
> He hath loosed the fateful lightning of His terrible, swift sword; His truth is marching on.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NOLAND].

Mr. NOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise briefly just to make a short statement at this time. I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS] should be commended for the inspirational note which he set in the closing paragraph of his speech. However, I hardly expected to sit here on the floor today and hear such a whitewash of the record of opposition which some of our friends on the other side of the aisle have had to the entire international program which has been put forth by President Truman and our administration.

I think that at this time it would not be a matter of partisanship if we stopped to actually look at the record and go back to the time when Greece and Turkey were threatened and President Truman, with great courage, announced the Truman Doctrine. I will say he had pretty strong bipartisan support for that. Then the President went ahead and, with a fine Secretary of State, proposed the Marshall plan. I think we should give credit for strong bipartisan support at that point. But only to some of the members of the administration was given the foresight to see the terrible conflict and struggle which lies before this Nation of ours. When the mutual defense assistance program was announced only a year ago, we could begin to see a defection in bipartisanship from the opposition which came about at that time. Even at the time of the explosion of the atomic bomb in Russia many of our friends did not have the farsightedness to join with President Truman and the administration in supporting and passing the beginning of the mutual defense assistance program.

The vote in the Senate in recent weeks has shown just how strongly Members of that body are rallying to the defense of President Truman and the administration by the passage of this legislation by a vote of 66 to 0.

I think if there is one thing the Korean situation emphasizes today it is that our military assistance program in Europe and throughout the world is not nearly extensive enough. It is estimated that this crisis in Korea will run in the neighborhood of $5,000,000,000. Today we are considering a bill for $1,222,000,000 to carry on a program in Europe involving a dozen or so member nations.

I have a little editorial here which appeared in one of the Scripps-Howard papers several months ago. One paragraph of this editorial says:

> Russia will spend more than $45,000,000,000 on her armed forces this year, United States intelligence sources say.

That exceeds our entire Federal budget for the current fiscal year. We are spending $13,000,000,000 or 32 percent of our budget for national defense. In any comparison between the two programs, however, it must be borne in mind that 25 percent of our military budget is payroll, and Russia's salary scales, on the other hand, are very puny by comparison.

This certainly illustrates the great disparity of defense expenditures by the freedom-loving nations as contrasted to the nations behind the iron curtain.

You know it is facetiously said that the Congress of the United States is about 2 years behind the people. Well, my fellow colleagues, this is one time in the history of the world that Congress cannot afford to be 2 years behind the people. When I was home for a special July Fourth celebration, talking to the man on the street and the people in drug stores and in the barber shops, this thought was given to me, that 90 percent of the people of America realize the seriousness of this international conflict which is going on.

They are willing to make the sacrifices that are going to be necessary in the years ahead. If there is one thing that we Members of Congress should do, as we go out in these coming months, it is to be honest with the people of America and to tell them not only that this conflict has been long in the making and has been building up for years, but that the solution of the peace and security of the world is likely to be a problem which will be with us many, many years, and that we here in the Congress may be struggling and fighting for peace for a long time.

Mr. Chairman, I strongly favor the passage of the mutual defense assistance program which calls for an appropriation of $1,222,500,000 for 1950. This legislation is most important at this time in the history of this Nation—in the history of the world.

In ancient fables there is a story which demonstrates the strength of unity. Two men were gathering sticks in a forest. One tied them into a bundle and wagered that his companion could not break it in two. Try as hard as he might, the man could not break the bundle of sticks. He turned to his friend after the attempt and stated that it was too strong for either of them to break. The other man immediately untied the bundle of sticks and proceeded to break them one by one.

The principle of strength in unity has been demonstrated in history since time immemorial. As 13 separate States, the American Colonies could never have survived to grow into this great Nation of ours. But in the Federal Union under a Constitution we have grown into the greatest Nation in the world.

Today we are discussing the continuance of the military assistance program or the arms aid bill.

The recent aggression of North Korea against South Korea makes extremely clear to everyone the Soviet intent of world domination. If there was ever any doubt in any of our minds as to this ultimate intent, it should be removed by this most recent act which has been perpetrated by the planning of the Kremlin.

Even prior to this act of totalitarian aggression, the whole pattern of Soviet activity has demonstrated that there is no let-up in the intensity of the Communist pressure.

As long ago as September 1949, the atomic explosion in Russia made it painfully clear that the Kremlin was pursuing its plan with utmost determination. Even with this terrible warning, many Members of both Houses of Congress failed to realize the communistic threat in the world and voted against the first arms aid bill which was the beginning step in building up the defenses of the freedom-loving countries of the world.

Also, recently the destruction of an unarmed United States plane over the Baltic demonstrated the contempt of these forces for other nations of the world.

For many months under the guise of a police force, Russia has been building up large armed forces in eastern Germany. Other satellite nations behind the iron curtain are armed to full capacity.

Throughout the world Communist propaganda has been stepped up to attack the United States as a warmongering nation, while Russia has been continuing her program of aggression. She has at the same time sponsored through Communist effort peace petitions and resolutions such as the Stockholm resolution calling for the abolition of the atomic bomb. Once world public opinion should be mobilized against the use of atomic bombs, even to stop aggressor nations, the great armed might of the Soviet Union could be used without fear of retribution.

There have also been attempts on the part of the Communists in France to provoke strikes to prevent the delivery and unloading of mutual defense assistance equipment in the form of arms and matériel.

Surely no more evidence than we now have is needed to make it plain to all of the democratic nations of the world the ultimate intent of the forces directed by the Kremlin.

President Truman and his administration are to be commended for a farsighted program in meeting this threat to the peace of the world. This plan has been placed into effect with the bipartisan support of certain Members possessed of foresight in both Houses of Congress, and it will work to weld the freedom-loving nations of the world together in a common opposition to the Communist program of totalitarian enslavement.

For more than 2 years now the United States has had an economic program through the Marshall plan to build up war-ravaged Europe and to prevent the conquest of western European democracies by the forces of communism. This has been an extremely effective program, and it is generally conceded that it has done much to prevent the spread of this totalitarian ideology.

On the military front, we have gone ahead with the North Atlantic Pact which set forth that it is the determination of the signing parties to defend their territories and their democratic institutions against those who would seek to destroy them. It makes plain that an armed attack against any one member is to be considered an attack against all members. It also provides in the event of such an attack that there shall be collective resistance to the utmost by all other partners to the pact.

To supplement the North Atlantic Treaty, and to coordinate the efforts of the members of the North Atlantic Pact, the mutual defense assistance program was devised. During its first year, it was successful, and it has started democratic nations of Europe on a program of defense and rearmament.

By coordination of the work on the economic front and the program on the military front, our country has been able to make great accomplishment on the political front. In the final analysis, if we are to achieve victory, the battle for men's minds is more important than the battle for territorial conquest. Through this program of mutual defense assistance, it has been possible to help strengthen the economic and moral fiber of freemen in Europe and throughout the world.

The mutual defense assistance program has already resulted in concrete achievement. Through this program of building up the defenses of Europe, a basis has been formed for general cooperation in peace to help solve mutual problems. It has brought about a meeting together of the representatives of many nations, a discussion of common problems, and a determination of solutions and a plan of action to meet these problems.

For instance, one of the results of this entire program of cooperation has been the establishment of a European Payments Union which should do much to improve the economic welfare of the member nations.

The program which I have just outlined is largely responsible for the historic proposal of Foreign Minister Schuman to pool the steel and coal production of western Europe under joint direction of member nations. He has also invited Germany to come in on an equal basis with other member nations. This proposal still remains to be worked out. However, the fact that the offer was made by France, a nation three times at war with Germany in the last hundred years, is indeed a tremendous accomplishment in world cooperation.

The military defense assistance program is under way, and the formulation of an integrated defense plan is at hand. An integrated defense plan means not only greater strength, but more defense per dollar expended. The stronger the Atlantic Pact nations become, the lighter is the defense burden on the United States. It is not contemplated to build up a fighting force to match the Soviet, division for division, but it is planned to set up a fighting force with equipment of modern weapons and modern matériel which is so important in warfare today.

This program of opposition to the forces of communism has given Marshal Tito and Yugoslavia the courage to make the first crack in the iron curtain. It has given him the courage to work independently for what he considers the welfare of his Communist country without complete subordination to the masters of the Kremlin. Even though we deplore communism, this is very desirable from our standpoint.

One of the greatest accomplishments of the mutual defense assistance program is that it has encouraged the European nations to help themselves. As individual nations, the leaders of these countries realized that it was useless to embark upon a program of full-scale preparedness which would exhaust the country economically. Therefore, there was a tendency to forget about preparedness completely. With the North Atlantic Treaty and mutual defense assistance program, these member nations are, for the most part, spending a greater amount for national defense than they would otherwise. By coordination of these expenditures, a program of integrated defense planning is being accomplished, with each nation concentrating on that military production which it is best able to perform.

Without the leadership of the United States, this whole program could not have come to pass. The question in my mind today is whether we are doing enough in the way of an arms-aid plan. With the current fighting in Korea estimated to cost about $5,000,000,000, it makes painfully evident to the average layman what a really small amount we are now investing in the future defense and preparedness of the democratic nations of Europe, Indo-china, Greece, Turkey, Philippines, and Iran. It is my opinion that this program should be doubled or tripled at this time to meet the opposition of the Kremlin which lies ahead.

As one high governmental official put it in testimony before the Senate committee, "only by forceful, concerted action along the lines which have been initiated can the countries which practice democracy preserve democracy."

The long-range objective of the entire program of economic assistance and arms assistance is peace and not war. The best way to obtain this peace is by a show of strength and unity which is uncompromising in its magnitude. The strength of Europe through development of this program will be one of the deterrents to war. The history of the past 5 years has shown that strength and might is the only way to impress the masters of the Kremlin. This program which we have under consideration is an attempt to bring about this greater strength and preparedness without exhausting the economy of any of the nations concerned.

I think it is always well to remember that at the present time the free nations of the world control a majority of the productive power of the world, the productive power which is available, not only in the waging of war, but in the providing of goods and services for the peoples of these countries. Until Russia believes that she has a preponderance of manufacturing and industrial might, she will hesitate to thrust a general war upon the world.

This fact demonstrates also our need for unity in our opposition to the forces of communism. Since the institution of the Marshall plan, industrial production in Europe has increased about 35 percent above the prewar average. Agricultural production will soon exceed the prewar levels, and in nearly every nation inflation is under control. These are achievements which the Soviet Union cannot match. The way to peace and security is not an easy one. It will undoubtedly require sacrifices from all of us, from the men and women of America and the people of the other freedom-loving nations of the world. There is no alternative. The sacrifice necessary to obtain this peace and security is worth it to all of us.

This conflict between the forces of democracy and the forces of totalitarianism has been long in the making and the solution may be nearly as long. It is hard to estimate what lies ahead, but I have faith that the people of this Nation and other nations have the courage, the will, and the tenacity to win out in the long-run battle for peace.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KRUSE].

Mr. KRUSE. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to have a few moments to express my feelings in regard to this legislation and in regard to the world situation generally.

I need hardly state that I join strongly with the overwhelming majority of the Members of the House in support of the extension of the military-defense assistance program. There is one phase of the over-all world situation today which causes me grave concern. It is quite obvious that the Soviet Union is attempting to hold itself up at this time as the true respecter and advocate of peace. There has been submitted through diplomatic channels a proposal for ending the Korean crisis. I do not at this moment know the exact details of the proposal which has been submitted. I am advised, however, that, among other things, the following two conditions are set forth as conditions precedent to a peaceful settlement of the Korean conflict: First, admission of Communist China to the United Nations; and second, withdrawal of American and United Nations forces from Korea.

I have every faith that those conditions are going to be rejected, but I would like to sound a cautious note at this time for those who might in the future be misled and fooled by such international chicanery and blackmail. Let us not forget that the avowed purpose of international communism is the achievement of a Communist-dominated world. If we in America or if free men the world over ever capitulate to such nefarious and ill-conceived proposals as are proposed at this time, I say unhesitatingly that that day will go down as the most infamous, the most tragic day in the history of this country.

We in America and free men the world over aspire to peace. We do not seek "peace at any price." We seek enduring peace with justice; we seek a world in which men can enjoy freedom to follow their own pursuits, to raise their families and to live decent lives. We seek an honorable peace and not one that must be purchased through loss of our character and loss of our freedom.

The admission of Communist China to the United Nations would for all practicable purposes prove to be a long step toward slavery and toward rendering the United Nations impotent. It would in addition signal to the international Communists that the door was now open for conquest of the entire Far East. There is no question in my mind but what we will continue to stand fast, and there is also no question in my mind but what truth and justice shall ultimately prevail.

I am now far more convinced than I was a week ago that people throughout America and free men throughout the world are strongly united and recognize the grave peril to our civilization. I personally feel as a citizen, as a legislator and as a veteran that America and our civilization today is in the greatest peril in its history. We cannot underestimate the danger.

Last week a young and distinguished colleague of ours, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BENTSEN], who had a magnificent record in this last war, stood on the floor and advocated the use of the atomic bomb. It shocked some people, but LLOYD BENTSEN tells me that his mail has been running about 10 to 1 in favor of his proposal. I can well understand, on certain grounds related to the military phase of the problem such as the terrain, dispersal of troops and the like, that there might truly be a question whether the bomb should be used; but I cannot forget, as one who experienced combat in the last war, that it matters little whether you are being bombed, shelled or attacked by other weapons of warfare. Americans today are not only being killed in combat on the battlefields at Korea; they are being butchered and murdered in cold blood. I have a strong tendency to go along with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BENTSEN] and his proposal, if such is necessary to save civilization at this time. Free men had better stand together at this moment and forget politics as usual and business as usual and get down to the more important business at hand. This is a time calling for complete unity and for taking all steps necessary to protect free men as against those whom we know seek world domination. I earnestly urge that we take every necessary step in order that we may be prepared in a military, industrial and psychological sense. I wish to further add that I think we must act as soon as possible to strengthen our laws to handle the unquestioned menace of communism within our own borders.

Were it not for those who down through the ages have been willing to fight and die for their fellowman, we would not have a nation wherein we could worry about business, economy and politics as usual. Our sacrifice is as nothing compared to those who carry the burden at this time. We can and we must meet the challenge.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON].

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, before I go into the subject matter that I am to cover, I want to express my appreciation of this Committee on Foreign Affairs, upon which I have served for 9 years. We stand together as good Americans. Yes, we argue, and we should, but we work together. We have a thoughtful, careful, meticulous, and splendid chairman. We have a very unusually fine ranking member of the minority, who for 2 years served as chairman. We have a membership of thoughtful and experienced people.

HELEN DOUGLAS is leaving us, and I would like to say a little personal word, HELEN, for in one way, I wish you luck; in another which you readily understand I must wish you ill. But I am happy to know you as I have known you.

For a little while I shall be the only woman on the committee. Let me say here that on this truly wonderful committee no differences are made. We work as a group, we work as individuals, we disagree as individuals, but we have come to you with this bill without a dissenting voice. We have had long hearings, and we have spent much time on the measures involved and on the problems involved.

I am not going to dicuss the details of the bill at all; others will give them to you but I want to talk for a few minutes about the causes, about the reasons why we have to have such a bill. I have not been able to escape the conviction that my 2 years as chairman of the Subcommittee on National and International Movements gives me the obligation to speak of these matters as we present to this House S. 3809, amendments to the 1949 Mutual Defense Assistance Act.

Why has it been necessary for us to recreate military strength to protect the road to peace? For peace is the ultimate goal toward which we are striving. The subcommittee to which I referred a moment ago was responsible for a piece of work which has become the textbook on world communism. You have all had copies of it. I hold it up that you may see what it looks like. The Senate committee sent copies to you in 1948; some of you have had other copies since then. It is called the Strategy and Tactics of World Communism and is House Document No. 619. In this original volume there are several supplements, one of which is called One Hundred Years of Communism. Another is Official Protests of the U. S., and Various Other Documents. Three other supplements, one on Czechoslovakia, one on the Near East, one on China. This last is probably the most accurate document on the methods of the Communist take-over of China.

Why do I bring this up? Because I want to make it very clear not only to the Congress but also to the people of this country that there has been an awareness in this body of the goals set by the Communists, that there has been an alertness. Granted, we have had to struggle against rather heavy odds sometimes to make ourselves heard.

On page 4 of this book printed in 1948, The Goals of Communism, you will find the following:

1. The Communists have one goal—world revolution.

2. They assume that the revolution will be violent.

3. They are incapable of accepting the idea that peace can endure from now on, and they expect one more catastrophic war.

4. The Soviet Union is regarded as the main force of the revolution.

5. They fear a coalition against the Soviet Union.

6. They therefore fear reconstruction or federation in the non-Communist world.

7. They utilize the most modern and effective means of cold warfare to strengthen their own forces and to weaken all others.

8. The Communist Parties outside the Soviet Union are junior partners or auxiliaries.

9. The tactics are based upon a definite theory, and the central propositions of that theory do not change.

10. The division of Europe and Asia between the victors of World War II is to be settled by power politics and not by negotiation.

Mr. Chairman, as I have read through these 10 goals, I hope you will see clearly why Communists everywhere have done some of the things they have done. Every act of theirs is definitely toward their one goal. They fear a coalition, therefore they have pronounced themselves as against everything we have been trying to do in Europe to strengthen Europe. On the same basis they would fear a federation in the Pacific. They fear the action of the United Nations because it draws together and emphasizes the power of the free nations of the world.

We have had difficulty, of course, to get our people and our Government to recognize the seriousness, the actuality of the Communist determination to take over all the peoples of the earth. We have forgotten that 100 years ago Marx and Engles lived and propounded a doctrine of world revolution and world control. We have forgotten that 80 years ago Communists took over Paris for a few months. We seem to have forgotten that there was a bloody revolution in Russia itself. We certainly should not forget.

We do not read what they have written nor what they have spoken vividly and widely. They have told us everything they expect to do.

Mr. Chairman, you will find in this volume, this subcommittee report, quotations from many Communist writings and speeches. You will find suggestions as to where you can find the whole text, because we were very aware as we were working at this that it is always dangerous to lift out small portions of any text. So we have given very clearly the sources and suggest that the libraries of this country have these documents in which you will find the full texts.

Based on the knowledge we had at hand there is no excuse for us, as a Nation to do what we have done and what we have failed to do except that we permited ourselves to become confused by the changes in their tactics, by our inability to follow their advances and seeming retreats.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman has expired.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentlewoman from Ohio five additional minutes.

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, one of the very interesting monographs of Mr. Lenin is on the importance of learning when and how to retreat. But when they retreated we thought. "Why, it is all wrong what we have been thinking about these fellows. They are really very nice people. They are going to be free people like ourselves. They are going to build up the free satellite countries."

Unfortunately we were so beclouded that we not only permitted them to take over one border country after another, but we assisted them. We gave them territories; we gave them power.

One of the greatest friends we ever had was the eternal, inexhaustible, wonderful country of China that we gave into Communist hands.

We forget that these Communists are Asiatics, too, and that they understand the Chinese mind. They knew that if they were to put their own people into China they could not get an inch of the way. So, they took many Chinese to Moscow, into their oriental school of communism, and trained them and sent them back. Mao-Tze-tung is a very good example of this kind of teaching. Thousands of them were so taught and sent back long ago, and do you think for one moment that they have not taken many Indochinese, Burmese, and every other kind of oriental people and are not at this moment deploying them out into these other areas? Unfortunately very few Americans know the differences between them. We think of them as being friends and brothers, imagine all kinds of things about them all. Not so the Russians; not so the Communists; they know. And remember that the Russian people are controlled by a small group of the police state determined upon the complete control of the world.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I feel I must express myself in relation to the suggestion made by our colleague from Texas the other day, which was commented on again a few moments ago, the suggestion that we say to the North Koreans. "Go back behind the thirty-eighth parallel or we will use the atomic bomb." Mr. Chairman and Members of this House, it seemed impossible to me that such a thing could be suggested at this time. For what purpose? To kill a lot of Koreans just because they are Communists? Would that stop the war? Do we know where the tanks and the guns and the airplanes are being manufactured? Do we not know that they do know where ours are being manufactured, and that one atomic bomb dropped by the United States of America would open us to atomic bombing? But, more than that, it would prove to the oriental mind the validity of the propaganda that has been poured out upon them by the Communists that we really are against Asia. Under no conditions must we do any one single thing that will give the people of Asia the right to feel that destruction is to be our purpose, when our one purpose is the peace of the world, of understanding among the nations.

In closing let me say that whatever we do in S. 3809 or in any actions that follow in the course of the next weeks and months, let us remember above all things that what we do must be done only after the most earnest and prayerful consideration, because we represent the believing nations and it is in God that we trust. As my Ohio colleague so well said, it is His truth that is marching on. But people do not like to face truth. Yet we must face it and act upon it and we must declare ourselves.

I hope there will be so few dissenting voices to this bill that they will hardly be heard. I hope above all things that in the consideration of this legislation and in all legislation pertaining to the future of mankind on this earth we as a legislative body may be governed entirely by the long view of man's responsibility to Deity.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. DOUGLAS].

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON] for the very kind things she said about me. I want to say to the members of the committee that it is with very real regret that I leave the House, with very real regret that I leave the Committee on Foreign Affairs. If nonpartisanship has any reality at all, I think we have come very near achieving it in the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The differences of opinion of that committee, as Mrs. BOLTON, the gentlewoman from Ohio, has said, have been individual differences for the most part.

We have been able to create in the committee a healthy atmosphere that has been very productive. Much farsighted legislation has been proposed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to this body. I think an objective appraisal of the performance and record of the committee will prove this.

I have enjoyed serving on the committee under the great chairmanship of the late Sol Bloom, then under the very distinguished chairmanship of the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. CHARLES A. EATON, and now under the farsighted and wise chairmanship of Judge JOHN KEE, whom all of us in this House love and admire so greatly.

The bill before us today, S. 3809, which would bring up to date the Mutual Defense Assistance program to Europe and to other parts of the world, I support wholeheartedly. I supported it before the committee when it was initially presented. If my memory serves me right, I think I was the first one on the Foreign Affairs Committee to state my full approval of this legislation when it was first discussed by the Secretary of State, the Hon. Dean Acheson. Through weeks of executive session, I fought for the bill as it was presented by the Defense and State Departments. I opposed any cut in the bill last year, both in committee and on this floor. I now support the bill to extend the mutual defense assistance program which is before the House today. I believed then and I believe now that the military aid program which was conceived and has been carried out in consonance with the United Nations Charter, is the only possible step we can take at this time toward creating the international police force which the world needs if aggression is to be checked and peace secured.

I still believe that the establishment of such an international police force is the goal toward which we ought to strive.

Mr. Chairman, the Members would do well, I think, to go back and read the findings and declaration of policy in the mutual defense assistance bill which the Committee on Foreign Affairs brought to the House last year. I quote the statement in full:

FINDING AND DECLARATION OF POLICY

The Congress of the United States reaffirms the policy of the United States to achieve international peace and security through the United Nations so that armed force shall not be used except in the common interest. The Congress hereby finds that the efforts of the United States and other countries to promote peace and security in furtherance of the purposes of the Charter of the United Nations require additional measures of support based upon the principle of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid. These measures include the furnishing of military assistance essential to enable the United States and other nations dedicated to the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter to participate effectively in arrangements for individual and collective self-defense in support of those purposes and principles. In furnishing such military assistance, it remains the policy of the United States to continue to exert maximum efforts to obtain agreements to provide the United Nations with armed forces as contemplated in the Charter of the United Nations require addi- control of weapons of mass destruction and universal regulation and reduction of armaments, including armed forces, under adequate safeguards to protect complying nations against violation and evasion.

The Congress hereby expresses itself as favoring the creation by the free countries and the free peoples of the Far East of a joint organization consistent with the Charter of the United Nations, to establish a program of self-help and mutual cooperation designed to develop their economic and social well-being, to safeguard basic rights and liberties and to protect their security and independence.

The Congress recognizes that economic recovery is essential to international peace and security and must be given clear priority. The Congress also recognizes that the increased confidence of free peoples in their ability to resist direct or indirect aggression and to maintain internal security will advance such recovery and support political stability.

In the findings and declaration of policy which I have just read you will note that the committee goes on record to declare that the United States should take the leadership in bringing about disarmament, with proper safeguards among the nations of the world, while providing the United Nations with armed forces as contemplated in the Charter. But it must be recognized that disarmament is impossible unless it is universal.

In bringing the mutual defense assistance program to the floor last year, the Committee on Foreign Affairs had not given up all hope of achieving a permanent peace in the world, but we felt the steps outlined in the Findings and Declaration of Policy of the Mutual Defense Assistance bill were essential if we were to prevent war and if there was to be real progress toward the accomplishment of a permanent peace in the world. The measure was brought to the floor as the beginning of a preventive program. That is why I felt it was foolhardy to cut the program, since the military said they had given us the basic minimum of what the first step toward such a preventive program ought to be.

If there were doubts about the program in the minds of some members a year ago, I am sure there are no doubts today in anybody's mind as to the soundness of this program. I do not suppose there will be many votes against it now—nor will there be any motion this time to cut the program.

You will remember, Mr. Chairman, that there were 209 Members of this body who voted last year to cut the program the military had presented as a basic minimum, if security was to be secured within a reasonable number of years.

I want to discuss at this point the Korean program as it relates to the European situation and to this mutual defense assistance bill now before us. We found ourselves in Korea as an accident of war. Korea had become a protectorate of Japan in 1905. It became her puppet in 1907. It was formally annexed by Japan in 1910. It was one of the conquered areas of the Japanese Empire awaiting liberation at the end of World War II. At the Cairo Conference, on December 1, 1943, China, Great Britain, and the United States were party to the pledge to guarantee Korea's independence. That pledge was later underwritten by Russia at the Potsdam Conference on July 26, 1945. Immediately after the Japanese ended hostilities Korea was occupied by forces of the United States and the Soviet Union. That occupation was solely for the purpose of receiving and administering the capitulation of the Japanese forces. To meet the immediate problem of coordinating the acceptance of the Japanese surrender in Korea, military authorities agreed on August 11, 1945, on the 38th parallel as the administrative line between the two forces. It approximately divides the country. It was a clear line on the map. That is the simple explanation for the line drawn on the 38th parallel.

The Russians entered first, on August 12, 1945. They were already just over the border of eastern Siberia. Our nearest forces were in Okinawa and in the Philippines. It took us almost 4 weeks to get to Korea. Someone might ask, "Why did it take so long?" The wonder is how we got there as fast as we did. Our troops were in a tropical climate. They had to be reequipped for a cold climate. Furthermore, Japan had first priority.

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield for a question?

Mrs. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. GRANGER. The gentlewoman said the thirty-eighth parallel was a line drawn only for receiving the surrender.

Is that actually true, or is there any division there as between people? Is there any division of the country that naturally heretofore had been divided?

Mrs. DOUGLAS. No.

Mr. GRANGER. Then the thirty-eighth parallel was just a division to receive the surrender of the Russians on one side and the Americans on the other?

Mrs. DOUGLAS. That is all. As I say, the Russians got into Korea faster than the Americans did, because they were right on the eastern Siberian border. As a matter of fact, they came down below the thirty-eighth parallel, but when the United States forces came in the Russians went back above that thirty-eighth parallel.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Certainly, I yield to my chairman.

Mr. KEE. As a matter of fact, at the time of the surrender of the Japanese Army, the nearest troops of the United States were in the Philippine Islands. The Russians, as you have said, were poised on the northern border of Korea, ready to march in. That agreement was made at that time for the sole purpose of taking the surrender of the Japanese Army, and the Russians took the surrender down to the thirty-eighth parallel, and the United States, when we got our troops in Korea, took it up to the thirty-eighth parallel. The Russians went in on August 2, 1945. It was not until September 12 that we were able to get our troops from the Philippines into the southern part of Korea, and then we found the Russians had moved in and had come south of the thirty-eighth parallel. We had to persuade them to go back. The line at the thirty-eighth parallel was never intended to have any political significance; it was solely a military measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. DOUGLAS] has expired.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentlewoman five additional minutes.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, the events that followed have been stated in the House. I made a speech about it a few days after the invasion against the Republic of Korea, and I will not repeat it here, except to brief those incidents.

The Russians dropped what amounted to an iron curtain at the thirty-eighth parallel. We sought to fulfill our pledge of Korean independence. We remained in Korea in order to fulfill that pledge. We endeavored for 2 years to negotiate with the Russian military in northern Korea so that that pledge could be fulfilled, but we were unable to get anywhere. We sought, first of all, to negotiate with the Russians in Korea, our military men talked with the Russian military in Korea. Then, it was taken up by the governments. When those attempts failed, we laid the problem before the General Assembly of the United Nations on September 17, 1947, and ever since that time, which is about 3 years, we have been the servant of the United Nations in Korea.

The United Nations decided that there should be a free election held in Korea under the supervision of a United Nations Commission. They sent a commission to Korea. We sent a commission to Korea. The Soviets were asked to send a commission into Korea to help supervise such an election. Russia did not send any such commission, nor would she allow the United Nations Commission to go into northern Korea. So that in southern Korea elections were held which ended finally in the establishment of the Republic of Korea. The United Nations declared that this was the only legitimate government in Korea.

As talent was developed among the Koreans, as their own governmental agencies were set up, our authorities transferred functions to them.

Finally, a year ago our military units were withdrawn in compliance with United Nations instructions.

At this point we could have abandoned the young Republic of Korea.

Up to this time any economic aid that had been given was given under our military government and after January 1, 1949, under the Economic Cooperation Administration. The Congress did not have a voice in establishing the policy in Korea. But it was the belief of the President of the United States, the State Department, and the military officials and concurred in largely by the Foreign Affairs Committee that if we did abandon the Republic of Korea she would collapse. It was recognized that the Republic needed economic aid over a short period of time in order to put it on its feet, especially since the country was divided. You will remember that we had in Korea just the reverse of what we have in Germany today. In southern Korea we have the agricultural half of the country, and in northern Korea we have the industrial half under the influence of the Russians.

The Foreign Affairs Committee brought to the floor a Korean aid bill which, you will remember, was defeated by one vote. I strongly supported that bill. I agreed with the findings of the military and the State Department that to abandon Korea would in a very real sense undermine our security in the Far East. We cannot hope to have security in the world or to have a peaceful world, or a free world, unless we have the confidence and trust of the people of the Far East. Had we abandoned Korea, had we not insisted on bringing through the House the Senate bill that provided aid to Korea, I am convinced that the Russians would have been in control of all of Korea today without a struggle. The failure of this Congress to act would have given to the Russians by default Korea which the Communists are now trying to take by force.

If we had not passed the Korean aid bill we would have lost the confidence, I am sure, of the peoples in the Far East. But we did pass the Korean aid bill through the insistence of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House. We also enacted some military aid under the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of last year.

The question now is—it gets very interesting—the question now is, why have the Koreans not been able to withstand this onslaught from the north? Why were they not given tanks and heavy equipment? First of all, the money proposed for military aid for Korea was $10,000,000. Do you know what we have spent in Greece to date? We have spent over $500,000,000. And this is not economic aid; this is military aid, and part of the economic aid that was given was made up of military items that were used in the military program. In the first year of our program in Greece, hardly any of the money went for economic aid; it all went for military aid.

The military did not propose the same kind of military aid brought to the floor of the House for Greece. You cannot furnish the arms to stop full-scale invasion with $10,000,000. The program passed by the Congress last year proposed to give to the Republic of Korea only the light arms and ammunition necessary to maintain internal order and to ward off the kind of skirmishes that had been going on along the thirty-eighth parallel. Had we brought to the floor of the House, Mr. Chairman, a bill for one, two, or three hundred millions, does anyone seriously support that the Congress would have authorized any such measure?

Then there is a much wider consideration that we must also keep before us. How much could we have afforded to put into this part of the world, considering the pressures in Europe and our commitments there?

The very same people who last year scoffed at military aid to Korea are now the greatest self-styled boosters of military aid. Before then they clamored, "This is money down a rathole." Now they shout, "We should have given Korea more."

What if this Congress had appropriated half a billion of military assistance to Korea, and instead of an attack on Korea, we were now faced with an attack on Burma or Indochina or Iran or on one of the North Atlantic Treaty countries? The answer is obvious: The same professional experts on criticism would be crying, "Why so much on Korea and so little on Burma or Indochina or Iran or the North Atlantic Treaty area?"

This whole matter is one of doing the most with a given sum of money and using it according to carefully considered plans and priorities designed to serve the total security interest of the United States. Those strategic decisions must be evaluated on the judgment made upon then existing facts and not upon events which later transpired. The mutual defense assistance program has emphasized the solidarity of western Europe, and I believe correctly so. There we have a collective self-defense organization which is functioning and which is making definite plans for the North Atlantic area. We are trying to do the same thing for the Far East. We have just declared unanimously that we favor the negotiation of a Pacific pact for the common defense of the Pacific area and the participation of the United States in that pact. But in western Europe we have a functioning collective self-defense organization which is developing over-all, integrated defense plans. We must therefore concentrate our energy on working through that organization, insofar as western Europe is concerned, and in building up a similar organization in the Far East.

The program of mutual defense assistance is a program to attain reasonable security. Nobody can guarantee absolute security.

Now, referring to the Korean situation today, I support the President's action 100 percent. If he had not moved, the United Nations would have been a dead thing today. Because he moved with dispatch to implement the United Nations Security Council resolutions on Korea he has buttressed the United Nations as a great instrumentality of international cooperation. The fact that the nations have responded to the request of the Security Council for aid to the Republic of Korea has brought the establishment of an international police force within the body more nearly in sight.

As a result of the police action in Korea there are certain steps that are clearly indicated at this time. First, the United Nations itself. We could not have taken the immediate action that we did in the United Nations if Russia had sat on the Security Council and had exercised its right of veto. Happily Russia was not there. Had she been there, we would then have had to turn to the General Assembly. It would have taken at least 3 days, maybe more, before a resolution from the Assembly of the United Nations could have been passed condemning the aggression against the Republic of Korea.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from California has expired.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentlewoman an additional 5 minutes.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Had it taken that long for the United Nations to act, the Republic of Korea might have fallen in that time to the aggressive forces from the north.

It is clearly indicated that the action that has taken place in Korea is not a single, isolated incident. I think we may expect a series of such aggressions throughout the world. Looking ahead to the future, should we not at once within the United Nations take the kind of action which will make it possible for that body to act instantly, even if there are those sitting on the Security Council who might want to veto such instant action?

No. 2: The Korean incident high lights our own deficiencies as far as military preparedness is concerned. We are going to have to appropriate more money for preparedness. We are going to have to have our Armed Forces better equipped. To do this will mean that there will have to be a greater drain on our economy. I do not believe, and I have not believed at any time since the end of the war, that the way to do this is to cut taxes and arbitrarily begin to reduce across the board. That is as detrimental to our position in a free world as not to have any defense forces at all. For instance, we talk about preparing ourselves militarily, and very few people will object to that today, but will they take the other steps that are demanded? Let us take steel. Today we are producing steel at 100 percent capacity. In other words, we are using our entire capacity in steel at the present time. If we increase our Armed Forces we have got to produce more steel. We entered World War II with an excess capacity of power—public and private—of between 30 and 40 percent. Never at any time during the war did our reserves of power drop lower than 18 percent, and today, my friends, I would point out to the Members of the Committee that we are below that figure; dangerously below that figure. Today the margin is only 12 percent. You cannot live without power; you cannot run your great industries without power. You cannot make aluminum without power and you cannot make planes without aluminum. When people blow off the tops of their heads with the cry, "We will cut off the Department of the Interior," they are cutting away the very strength that will enable this country to defend itself in war. We must give some real study to this. I believe that the situation in Korea can be an eye opener that will save us in the long run. I think we can point to our shortcomings, point out the things we have not done that we must do, maybe make us talk some sense for a change, and not try to appeal to the voters, to "cut taxes" when it means maybe that this man's son or that woman's son would have to die on the battlefield because of a few dollars cut in taxes. No, nobody likes to pay taxes, but we have got to expand our economy if we are to seriously plan for peace in the world.

What is Russia afraid of? She is afraid of the great potential of this country to mobilize our industrial strength, and I believe she is afraid more of that than of our soldiers at various places in the world. She knows that this country can out produce her. This will do more to hold her, to restrain her, than any other single thing.

So, I think it was foolhardy when the power program was cut in this country. I think it has been foolhardy ever since the end of the war when those of short sight or selfish interest moved to cut that power program.

We must try to achieve the goals that we all want. There are those who are rather shortsighted; some may be a little more absorbed with their own desires than they ought to be, but basically we all want the same thing. I think we have got to sit down very realistically and see what it will take, and then we have got to proceed and do the things that are necessary. Peace is not cheap, but war is a lot more expensive. Mr. Hoffman testified some months ago before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I believe, that the cost of the war, when it is finally added up, will be over $1,350,000,000,000—that is one trillion three hundred and fifty billion dollars. So, in terms of money there is no comparison between what war costs and what it will cost to build an enduring peace. But, we have to build it; we have to build it brick by brick, and stone by stone. What those of us who pointed to the importance of Korea have said has been borne out. I think in terms of peace and in terms of security for our own children. Let us learn by it. Let us not spend our time in recriminations. Let us profit from our lessons, and let us all, together, wisely plan for the future, a future that has strength in it; a future that is mapped along courageous and hopeful lines, and let us rid ourselves of the fear that is every day being deliberately injected by some into the bloodstream of America. We have nothing to fear except our failure to face facts and to take the action they call for.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 19 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I intend to support this legislation. I think that whatever differences we may have had on this kind of assistance in the past we must now close ranks, and the command is "Forward," together.

I wish it might be as easy as that, Mr. Chairman, to satisfy my people. They are asking many questions today and they want to know how we came to get into this situation. The bill before us contains some money for Korean assistance. In the time allotted me I shall address myself to that problem.

Many Members who have opposed aid for Korea in the past did so on the ground that it could not be defended with Communists in control of China. Certainly economic aid without adequate military support was an unwise operation.

Then there was a further reason and that was the testimony of both State Department officers and members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff that South Korea was untenable if the Red Koreans or the Russians decided to attack.

There never was justification in my opinion for the investment of American dollars for permanent improvements in Korea when the Red Koreans could take it over at will.

In order to keep the record straight and not in the spirit of "I told you so," I shall refer to pertinent testimony by administration witnesses from hearings before our committee in support of the Korean programs.

In February 1948, in the Eightieth Congress, Gen. George Marshall, then Secretary of State, testified:

Mr. JUDD. There is a military attack upon the governments in each case and the economic aid can do no good if the governments go down; is not that correct?

Secretary MARSHALL. That is correct.

And further and at the same time, apropos Korea, Secretary Marshall said:

Mr. JUDD. * * * If North Korea and Manchuria should be taken over and organized by the Communists, do you think our position in Korea would long be tenable?

Secretary MARSHALL. I think it would not be tenable.

Hearings on H. R. 5330; providing aid for the Republic of Korea, June 1949: Developed interesting testimony on the questions of economic aid and the futility of it, without military support. Also that the administration did not want to support Korea militarily. Excerpts follow:

Page 43:

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. If we would draw our troops out of South Korea, is there anything that would stop the Russians from taking over South Korea if they decided to do so?

General HELMICK. If the Russians decided to do so, they could take over South Korea without any great military difficulty, sir. They are right there with large armies. Any troops that we have there would suffer another Bataan.

Page 44:

Mrs. BOLTON. General, you made a remark that this would prove militarily another Bataan if Russia were to move down. Does that mean that you feel it is just a matter of time before they would simply move on?

General HELMICK. What I meant was a military force on a peninsula like that would be out of luck with an overwhelming force coming down from the north. I think Russia could do it any time that she decided it was worth while.

Mrs. BOLTON. That might well happen at any time if she made up her mind. Now, that she has all of northern China, she would want that little peninsula to hop off to Japan with?

General HELMICK. I think she would have to estimate the effects of her doing it.

Page 52:

Mr. JACKSON. * * * Now it has been said so often that Korea is absolutely untenable, or would be, in the face of any determined opposition, whether that opposition be military or whether it be by infiltration. That is a fair statement, is it not, General?

General HEMLICK. From a military point of view, yes.

Page 120—Mr. George F. Kennan, director, Policy Planning Staff, Department of State:

Mrs. DOUGLAS. * * * Is it sound to withdraw United States troops from Korea, July 1, having only technical forces to further train the Korean army? * * *

Mr. KENNAN. I do not think, myself, that the retention of American troops there will be what it takes to do the thing we want to have done in the next year in Korea. * * *

General BOLTE. With respect to whether the tactical units should come out now or whether they should remain for an additional period of, say, a year, we feel that they should come out now. * * * We feel that they not only could come out but that they should come out, and their place be taken by the Korean military advisory group.

Gen. Charles L. Bolte testified as director, Plans and Operations Division, Department of the Army.

Page 137:

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Kennan, there is an interesting article in Time magazine on Korea. * * * I understood you to say that you thought in a battle between North and South, the South Koreans would have a pretty fair chance. Do you suggest that this information in Time magazine is erroneous or do you think that 300,000 North Koreans would have a very difficult time against 100,000 armed South Koreans?

Mr. KENNAN. I would like to refer that question to General Bolte.

General BOLTE. I believe that is an exaggeration. * * * We feel that the forces in South Korea are far better equipped than the North Korean troops.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Why did the general make that statement? What basis did he have for making that statement? The gentleman, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, ought to be able to answer that question.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I think that was a military question, if you please.

Mr. CRAWFORD. No, what I mean is, I think the Committee on Foreign Affairs should have asked the general on what basis he made that statement, and make him put it in the record, because we have to depend upon you to get the information for us. I do not think he had any basis on earth for making that statement.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Page 140:

General BOLTE. If I may, I would like to make three comments in the interest of clarification of what was said yesterday. First, that the Army as the executive agent for the Joint Chiefs of Staff for the Far East, is not only agreeable to the withdrawal of the tactical formations from Korea, but are heartily in favor of it, as they feel that the point has been reached in the development of the South Korean forces and in the supplying of material aid as well as advisory aid to the South Korean forces, that it has reached a point where the tactical units can and should be withdrawn.

The second point I should like to make—and I think it has been made before this morning—is that we have provided very substantial material aid to the South Korean forces in the way of small arms and other military equipment.

This has been estimated to be $125,000,000.

Page 141:

Mr. SMATHERS. I have not had the benefit of the general's direct testimony, but I understood Mr. Kennan to say that it was the policy, General, to withdraw what small troops we have in Korea. Is that right?

General BOLTE. That is correct.

Mr. SMATHERS. Then the withdrawal is solely in conformity with the United Nation's resolution?

General BOLTE. Yes, but the Army is definitely in favor of it for other military reasons.

Page 143:

Mr. LODGE. You feel that the Korean Government is able to fill the vacuum caused by the withdrawal of the occupation forces?

General BOLTE. Definitely.

Page 160:

General TIMBERMAN. * * * From the Army point of view on the military significance or impact upon our position in the Far East that attends the tactical withdrawal of our forces in Korea, we will be in much better shape militarily when the tactical forces have been withdrawn from Korea.

Page 163:

General TIMBERMAN. If we left troops in Korea, I do not think anyone would suggest we enter into combat with the Korean forces.

Page 169:

Mr. SMITH. Yes, but I have asked you from a military standpoint how will this aid program increase our security. I would certainly like to have some conclusion by the military on that question. In what way? That is what I am concerned about. * * *

(Discussion off the record.)

Mr. SMITH. It seems to me that you have just admitted that from a military standpoint it does not affect our national security.

General TIMBERMAN. No; it does not. As an agency of the government we help where we can. I do not think the military part of the matter enters into the economic aid at all, besides we might get into trouble later on, after we are in there militarily, which would be unfortunate.

Page 170:

Mr. SMITH. Assuming it (Korea) went down because we did not give the aid, would it follow from that, that we might have to go in there with military force and defend ourselves or our national security?

General HAMILTON. No, sir; I do not think it is a question of direct military security in that sense. I do not think, unless we were to put absolutely inordinate forces in Korea, that we could guarantee by military force against economic collapse. The military phases are over.

Page 177:

Mr. RICHARDS. I just want to ask one question: Is it your position * * * that it would not be wise to keep troops in Korea? * * *

General TIMBERMAN. Yes, sir; it would not be wise. * * *

Admiral WOOLRIDGE. I concur.

General HAMILTON. I concur fully and that has been the position of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. It has been unanimous. There has been no difference so far as I know.

Page 178:

Mrs. DOUGLAS. I would like to ask the representatives of the Joint Chiefs of Staff this question: Do I understand correctly that the Chiefs of Staff advise the withdrawal of troops from Korea at this time?

General HAMILTON. That is correct.

Admiral WOOLRIDGE. That is correct.

General TIMBERMAN. That is correct.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. The Army, Navy, and Air Force?

General HAMILTON. That is correct.

Page 181:

Mr. JUDD. You do not deny that the Army has wanted to get out for a long, long time?

Mr. JOHNSON of ECA. No, sir.

Page 186:

General HAMILTON. * * * It has unquestionably been decided long since by the Joint Chiefs of Staff that there is nothing further that we should do militarily.

* * * * * *

Mr. JUDD. * * * I believe sincerely that the Korea economic program, accompanied by military withdrawal and without a program to keep the Chinese Communists busy, does not have more than a 25 percent chance of success and therefore I question whether we are justified in approving this. * * *

Mr. JOHNSON. I think this committee will admit that I have been very honest and candid with you. I frankly believe this program has a 90 percent chance of success.

Mr. Chairman, until last June 25 there was great reluctance on the part of President Truman and Secretary Acheson and his advisers—Jessup, Lattimore, and Service—to come to grips with the real problem in the Far East, in fact, they deliberately avoided it. They were perfectly willing to let the dust settle and wait for results. They also appeared ready to recognize Communist China and do business with it. When the blow fell on the 25th of June it was obvious that our far-eastern policy or lack of it was a colossal blunder and it has put us in another war 7,000 miles from home.

Mr. Chairman, the record of our foreign policy in the Far East has been made. Our mistakes live after us but the people are entitled to the facts. We had a good yardstick to follow in the Wedemeyer report contained in the State Department's so-called white paper on China. We chose to ignore General Wedemeyer's recommendations. Here are his words:

In order to preclude defeat by Communist forces it is necessary to give the National Government sufficient and prompt military assistance under the supervision of American advisers in specified military fields.

American military aid to China, ground, sea, and air, would, if appropriately supervised, contribute to gradual development of stability in the Far East and lessen the possibility of a Communist-dominated China.

So Mr. Chairman, when the Nationalist Government in China went down, our position in Korea was untenable and Japan, Formosa, the Philippines, Malaya, and Indochina were placed in jeopardy. It was our colleague the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD], who fought so valiantly for the program in China that General Wedemeyer advocated. Had the advice of Mr. JUDD been followed by the State Department, there would have been no war in Korea and American boys would not be dying 7,000 miles from home.

But do I hear someone say, "But that is all water over the dam"? Quite true, but dumb indeed must we be if we do not profit by experience.

As has just been shown, the administration's conduct in Korea and other places is full of contradictions. It has demonstrated its inconsistency, its incompetence. That being true, in these tragic days, when the very security of the Republic is threatened, we should not look for guidance nor entrust our future to those who are responsible for the position in which we now find ourselves.

In November the people, regardless of their political faith, should elect a Congress, and in 1952 a President, who will always have first in mind the welfare and future security of this Republic.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 13 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BATTLE].

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this legislation because it is part of a program necessary to bring about peace in the world.

As a result of the tragic invasion of Korea, we should learn the hard lesson that it will be necessary in the future for us to abandon the policy of retaliation and invest our time, money, and efforts in a policy of war prevention.

Our whole defense is built on the basis of retaliation. On the basis of what we will do, after we have been attacked. We all remember Secretary of Defense Johnson's speech a few days ago when he said that within an hour after we are attacked we will be ready to retaliate. Irrespective of our state of preparedness or unpreparedness, Secretary Johnson was reflecting the policy established by the American people and the American Government under which the military must operate.

Korea emphasizes the fact that the overwhelming odds favor the aggressor. An aggressor nation knows what it is preparing for, knows what it is going to do, knows where it is going to attack, and is in a position to choose the time and place for a knockout blow with the least effort. Our policy has been to wait, to sit back, to take a beating, and then struggle to our feet and whip the bully. We have always been saved by time, distance, and strong allies. But we have none of these things between us and the enemy now, and we had better not count on them.

In the warfare of today it is not a question of being knocked off our feet and getting up to retaliate. If we wait until the global battle lines are formed and until an aggressor delivers a sneak knockout punch at America—then it might be too late to act.

The United States and the world must be ready and prepared to stop war before it starts. Plenty of danger signals have warned us that an aggressor nation was on the move in every instance, long before the attack came. That is the time to call their hand. We must never again underestimate the ability of a nation that has clearly demonstrated that it is following a policy of world aggression. We must adopt a policy of war prevention and discard our old policy of retaliation if we are to escape man's inhumanity to man in this twentieth century of technical geniuses and social idiots. Investment in a peace offensive will be cheap indeed as compared to the money and lives we spent in emergencies such as we are facing today, after they have developed.

Of course, in this crisis we must remedy our weakness as quickly as possible and build up our armed forces to whatever strength is necessary for defense. If the successful conclusion of this crisis takes total industrial and military mobilization, then I am for it. If the successful preservation of peace in the world takes the greatest defense effort we have ever made, I am for that too. The quicker we face the realities and the graveness of the situation, and prepare ourselves and our allies to meet this crisis, the closer the world will be to peace. While the Mutual Defense Assistance Act is only a small part of this program, it is necessary at this time to give the friendly, peace-loving countries throughout the world this moral and material protection against invasion. Supplying arms to the friendly nations under this Mutual Defense Act is a dangerous program, there is no doubt about it. But the alternatives appear to be more dangerous.

We have learned the hard way that there is no peace in appeasement, that dictators make slaves out of pacifists, and that isolationism is a fiction in this age when we can fly around the world in just a few hours.

Mr. Chairman, in addition to this necessary mutual defense assistance program, I think very definitely we had better develop a Pacific pact similar to the Atlantic Pact, to insure mutual participation in the Pacific against aggression and to insure a strong arm in the Far East as well as in Europe.

Neither the United States nor any one nation alone can afford the men and money necessary to police the entire world indefinitely. Therefore, it behooves us to not only support but to strengthen the best instrument for a peace offensive which we have in the world—the United Nations. Russia made her biggest blunder in her campaign to enslave the freedom-loving nations of the world when she boycotted the Security Council of the United Nations in this Korean crisis. Withdrawal from the Council by the Reds made possible the unprecedented swift sanction of military action which is necessary to stop the Kremlin-planned aggression in southern Korea.

I would like to pause to say that the action of our representatives in the United Nations and of our Chief Executive in this crisis is certainly to be commended, and certainly has my support 100 percent.

The usual veto would have rendered the UN helpless again in its most crucial hour. A Communist victory over the democratic country of South Korea, which was established by the United Nations with the full backing of the United States, would make world war III almost certain. Other nations in the Far East and in Europe would bow to Stalin's superior forces which could overrun any of her neighbor countries unless America helped to stop them. Now we have a fighting chance for peace. Freedom-loving people the world over should press the advantage of our combined peace offensive which will be implemented by this mutual defense assistance program. When this fight is won, as it will be, let us not stop short of reorganizing the United Nations, to make it capable of preventing war under any conditions. World peace must not depend upon the wrong moves or blunders by Russia, or by any other greedy nation. Hitler proved that the waiting, appeasement, retaliation process is too costly and deadly. World peace must not depend upon the wrong moves of Russia but must be won and preserved by the right moves of America, the United Nations, and the freedom-loving countries everywhere.

Mr. Chairman, America has taken the lead to stop Russia and save the United Nations. When the shooting is over, and I pray that may be soon, we should take the lead in rebuilding the United Nations into an organization capable of preventing war. Some time ago I introduced House Concurrent Resolution 15, along with several other Members of Congress, which calls upon the President to immediately take the initiative in calling a general conference of the United Nations pursuant to Article 109 for the purpose of making the United Nations capable of enacting, interpreting, and enforcing world law to prevent war. Therefore, it is with a deep conviction that I am asking the House Foreign Affairs Committee and the Members of this great body to give your most serious consideration to this resolution designed to take the first step in reorganizing the United Nations which is absolutely necessary if we are to have peace.

The idealistic and the best solution to our international difficulties would be a moral reawakening throughout the world. That places a tremendous responsibility upon our religious and political leaders, a responsibility which to date has not been successfully met. Until such time as we are successful in bringing about conditions where nations truly feel that they are their brother's keeper, and until nations will follow the golden rule of "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you," it will be necessary for us to stay adequately prepared to stop an aggressor nation before it attacks us, and it will be necessary to create a police force for the United Nations to keep law and order. These things are necessary in the smallest community. They are also necessary in our world community.

Mr. Chairman, with the extension of the mutual defense assistance program, the development of a Pacific pact, the strengthening of the United Nations, and the encouragement of a moral reawakening, I believe we can look forward with more assurance to the peaceful world community we all hope and pray for.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 13 minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. MERROW].

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Chairman, on the 11th of June, the Foreign Affairs Committee, by a vote of 24 to 0, reported S. 3809, an act to extend the mutual defense assistance program of 1949. This bill was passed by the Senate on June 30, 1950, without a dissenting vote. S. 3809 authorizes funds to continue the mutual defense assistance program through the current fiscal year. Since the substance of the Senate bill incorporates the provisions of the measure on which the Foreign Affairs Committee held long and extensive hearings, it was decided to report S. 3809 to the House without further amendment.

This is a defense measure. The security of the United States is closely entwined with the security of all free nations throughout the world. We cannot follow a policy of arming ourselves in isolation and thereby insure our security. We are assisting our friends not that they will defend us, but so that we and they will be able to defend ourselves and together defend the free world.

COST OF ECONOMIC AND MILITARY PROGRAMS

Since the termination of World War II and particularly since the inception of the Marshall plan, the United States has been extensively helping in the economic rehabilitation of Europe. To carry on the European recovery program we have spent $10,230,000,000 to date and have authorized $2,850,000,000 for the present fiscal year. Last year the Congress authorized and appropriated $1,314,010,000 for military aid to the following countries: United Kingdom, France, Belgium, Luxemburg, the Netherlands, Italy, Norway, Denmark, Iran, Korea, Philippines, Greece, and Turkey. The measure which we are now considering authorizes a total of about $1,436,500,000 to continue the mutual defense assistance program until June 30, 1951—$1,222,500,000 of new funds and approximately $214,000,000 carried over from last year.

ALLOCATION OF FUNDS

Title I of Senate bill 3809 provides $1,000,000,000 for the North Atlantic Treaty area. This will be used to provide actual military equipment and training assistance and the means to produce more to build up the armed forces of the individual nations according to the integrated defense plan for the protection of the whole area. In addition, $75,000,000 will be spent for raw materials and industrial equipment for the production of military items in Europe by Europeans in their own factories. The $1,000,000,000 also includes $12,000,000 for the expense of administering the whole program.

Title II provides $131,500,000 for Greece, Turkey, and Iran. The funds will be used in these countries to strengthen the combat effectiveness of their armed forces. The objective of these funds is to increase the capacity of each to maintain internal security and to resist aggression. In Greece the aim is to improve the ability to deal with guerrilla activity, actual or threatened. In Turkey the goal is to modernize and streamline their army to increase Turkey's capacity to resist aggression. A modernized force would permit a maximum military effort at a cost less than at present. In Iran the problem is one of capacity to maintain internal stability, as well as to strengthen the defense against aggression from the outside.

Title III provides $16,000,000 for the Philippines and Korea. The objective in the Philippines is to provide equipment and training to preserve order and suppress the Hukbalahap guerrilla activity threatening the country. The share for Korea was based on building up the capacity of the Korean security forces to maintain stability in the country and prevent border raids from the north. Since the invasion from the north, the nature of the problem has totally changed. At the present time equipment is being rushed to meet the present crisis. The Korean program obviously must be revised completely to meet the need of the present situation.

Seventy-five million dollars for the general area of China is made available in addition to the same sum provided last year. This will be used to continue and expand programs already in operation, also to begin those now being formulated. The funds are to aid forces in that area that are either now engaged or may possibly become engaged in active conflict with Communist elements.

UNDERLYING PRINCIPLES

In adopting the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, the Congress established certain lines of policy to guide the operation of the program. It was recognized that economic strength is a prerequisite to peace and security. In Europe, particularly, this meant that economic rehabilitation was a first order of business. However, it was also recognized that in some instances military assistance might be required to achieve a reasonable degree of order in which economic rehabilitation could proceed. Economic recovery was given a clear priority, but the committee pointed out in its report that the principle should be generalized in application.

It is a settled policy of the Government to support actively and fully the principles of the United Nations Charter. We are acting in Korea in accordance with this principle. Military assistance was tied closely to this policy by the explicit mandate of the Congress. Support of the Charter included the furnishing of mutual-defense assistance to those nations participating in individual and collective arrangements under the Charter.

It is clear that no individual nation has economic and military strength sufficient to carry the security burden of the whole free world. Therefore, the principle of self-help was laid down as a policy for this program. Self-help means that each country receiving assistance is to exert the utmost effort in its own behalf, but self-help in a collective endeavor of all to provide the needed economic and military strength means that this program is a mutual undertaking. Security of the free world is, indeed, a mutual problem. The policy of the Congress is that assistance should also be based on the mutuality of security.

All of these principles relate closely to another—the confidence of people and their ability to resist aggression, whether direct or indirect. Morale is an important factor in any undertaking. Increased confidence and ability to resist aggression is indispensable to economic recovery, also to political, economic, and social stability. They are essential elements of military strength.

CONCERTED ACTION

Much progress has been made toward the economic recovery of western Europe. Under the relentless pressure of events Europe has moved toward unity as evidenced by the creation of such arrangements as the Western Union and its various subsidiary groups, the European Payments Union, the Council of Europe, and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Never has there been a more pressing need for unity. The West faces ominous danger. Unless there is concerted action toward the immediate achievement of military integration and unity, the West will be at an obvious disadvantage in the struggle against international communism. The mutual aid program should be accelerated, and it is most essential to extend at once the help contemplated in this measure. At an early date additional assistance will be required to so increase the defenses of the West that our security will be impregnable.

On the 4th of April 1949 the North Atlantic Treaty was signed in the city of Washington. The free nations of the West, realizing the necessity for concerted action, decided to form an association under the Charter of the United Nations for the purpose of protecting themselves from a possible aggressor. Under the North Atlantic Pact "the parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all."

Since the signing of this pact the Western World has moved toward unifying the Atlantic community. The North Atlantic Council has been working to achieve unity, and through the mutual defense assistance program we have succeeded in laying a foundation for military coordination and integration which will materially assist in protecting the Western World. The west must hasten rearmament programs to deter aggression and to defend itself if a direct assault is perpetrated.

EUROPE IN DANGER

The free nations of western Europe are in grave danger. The brazen attack on South Korea may be but the beginning of a world-wide program of carefully planned aggression. Free peoples must move to improve their military positions immediately. Only by fully preparing for any emergency will the West be in a position to turn back the Red tide. By continuing arms aid to Europe and by speeding our own military preparedness, the power of the free world will be so augmented that the encroachments of communism can be checked. Time is exceedingly important. We are in a world-wide struggle for keeps. The road to survival is strength.

WORLD DIVIDED

The world is sharply divided. On the one hand is Communist Russia and her satellites; on the other are the democracies. Communism means despotism, tyranny, enslavement and death. Democracy embraces the finest ideas and the highest ideals to which the human spirit is capable of aspiring. Democracy is freedom and the opportunity to live without the constant fear of aggression and attack. We are engaged in a struggle for our survival; communism strives to engulf all the nations of this earth.

RED PRESSURE

A cursory survey of a world map impresses us vividly with the points of rising Communist pressure. The Soviet Union through its satellites are incessantly pushing against western Germany, Austria, and Yugoslavia. Within the past few days there have been reports of Bulgarian, Hungarian, and Rumanian troop movements opposite the border of Yugoslavia. Demands for the control of the Dardanelles are constant. Iran is being pressed by Moscow to grant concessions. This strategic country could well be the victim of aggression in the not too far distant future. The Far East is now in sharp focus as Red pressure is being exerted on Tibet, Burma, Thailand, French Indochina, and Formosa, and as Communist-conducted warfare is being waged against the Republic of Korea.

We are in a continuing crisis. In view of the unprovoked attack on the Republic of Korea and the mounting pressure against free nations, it is essential that our policy of extending military assistance to free nations be accelerated as rapidly as possible. It has become clear beyond dispute that the only language the Communists understand is the language of armed strength. In this world-wide struggle for survival the democracies can and must prevail. To do this there must be an immediate augmentation of their defenses. Such a course will discourage future attacks.

COMMUNIST TACTICS

In view of the philosophy and the activities of the Communists, we can expect not less but more aggression. The Soviet Union has a large military force and is in control of thousands of satellite troops. We cannot proceed on the assumption that the satellite forces are militarily second rate. This has been blasted by the operations in Korea. This encounter demonstrates that the Communist troops possess good equipment, employ smart tactics, have excellent leadership, and are motivated by a fanatical determination to spread their tyranny.

It is possible, under the system of international communism, to have the military forces of the free world very heavily committed and in dangerous places all over the earth without the Soviet Union committing any of its huge military machine. It is perfectly clear that satellite forces may initiate a shooting war simultaneously in many places. Thus, world conditions make imperative the immediate passage of this measure. World conditions make it necessary for the democracies to accelerate their military production.

At the end of the Second World War our Allies were exhausted, both economically and militarily. After the termination of hostilities in 1945 the United States disarmed unilaterally. Efforts to reconcile the differences between the free world and the Soviet world have proved fruitless and futile. A quick review of the years extending from 1945 to the present time shows that the Soviet Union has done everything to prevent the establishment of a free world and has done all within its power to frustrate the efforts of those who seek to build a decent international society. This has been accomplished in several ways. The veto has been employed in the United Nations on 39 occasions. The United Nations has been used as a sounding board for vituperative utterances against the free world and particularly the United States. International conference after conference has been wrecked and torpedoed by the recalcitrance and uncompromising attitude of the Communists. The Soviet Union has prevented any basic agreement on the solution of international problems.

Ambassador Douglas, in a statement made when the hearings on the mutual defense assistance program were going on this year, said:

> We have learned that only the strong can settle issues with the Kremlin peacefully. Collateral dividends are derived from a condition of strength.

I have held this opinion for a long time. In a speech to the House on December 15, 1947, after having been to the Near East and Western Europe, I said:

> In the face of the open hostility being displayed by the dictatorship of Russia, our only course is to strengthen our defenses and make ourselves sufficiently strong to cope with any and all emergencies. There is not the least scintilla of evidence that the Communist dictatorship entertains even the remotest desire to establish a peaceful world. Even the most superficial inspection of the record leads us to the conclusion that they will not accede to any program other than their own sinister plan which leads to the complete crushing of freedom and to a final and ultimate tyrannous subjection of all people.

The great significance of the President's action in the Far East is that we have now definitely drawn a line against aggression in Asia. From now on aggression in the east, as well as in the west, will be met with determined action.

In a speech entitled "A Bipartsan Foreign Policy," on this floor the 1st of April 1948, I proposed definite action against aggression. The seventh principle reads as follows:

> The United States should inform the world and particularly the Soviet Union that we intend to use our force to stop aggression directed at strategic points such as the approaches to the Atlantic, Gibraltar, the countries of western Europe, the Dardanelles, Greece, Turkey, Iran, the Near East, the Persian Gulf area, China, and the islands of the Pacific. We should state clearly that whenever there is encroachment on these areas, or any other strategic positions, the integrity of which we deem essential to the security and the survival of the United States, the power making such an encroachment will meet with our immediate, sustained, and unrelenting resistance. We should for our own self-interest and the peace of the world establish a line beyond which an aggressor may not move without encountering the full force and power of the United States.

CLEAR AND REALISTIC THINKING

The current crisis demands clear realistic thinking and most competent statesmanship. We must clearly evaluate our foreign policy and more particularly our military policy in relation to our total foreign policy. Military assistance to the countries of western Europe and to the free nations in the Near and Far East has become a part of our over-all policy. The mutual defense assistance program begun last year will have to be continued until this struggle between the free and the enslaved world has been resolved in favor of human liberty.

The lot of Europe is cast with that of the free world. The net effect of an increase in the growth of power in Europe is to increase the power of the West. This is most urgent. Militant communism is not a theory. Militant communism is a program of aggression, seeking to carry the techniques of tyranny to every corner of the earth. It is an inescapable fact that communism, as has been demonstrated very graphically in the Korean situation, does not shrink from aggression—cold or hot. Nothing except superior force will stop communism in its attempt to achieve its sinister goal of world domination.

MORE FUNDS REQUIRED

This bill is calculated to help establish and maintain peace so as to prevent a general world conflict. In view of the tension existing around the globe it is my opinion that the sum authorized in the measure under discussion is insufficient. I am ready to vote for much larger sums to improve at once the mutual defenses of the free world. By adopting this measure and immediately agreeing to the appropriation we will have again made it perfectly clear that we intend to continue our resistance to aggression. It will be plain that we will employ our power to maintain the integrity and the independence of the free world. Just as we have fought aggression in the past, so we will continue our stand against tyranny until the Communist drive in Korea is halted and until the spread of despotism is arrested around this globe. Nothing less than human freedom is at stake. Democracy today is hanging in the balance. The Western World is waging a life-and-death struggle for its existence. The free nations must, and will, cooperate to win this battle for liberty. The Western World has the resources, the ability, and the determination to prevent communism from dominating the earth.

OBJECTIVES OF THE MUTUAL DEFENSE ASSISTANCE ACT

In joining the North Atlantic Treaty and in adopting the Mutual Defense Assistance Act last year, we drew a line against aggression in western Europe, and on June 27, 1950, a similar line was drawn in Asia. I supported the mutual defense assistance program last year and voted for the entire authorization, also the full appropriation as requested. I am happy to give my full support to the present measure under discussion and stand ready to vote to authorize and appropriate all the funds necessary to increase the strength of the Western World sufficiently to stop the universal Communist drive.

The 1951 mutual defense assistance program is planned to carry on the objectives of the 1950 program which has changed only in the urgency of achieving the end result. In the present situation there are several important factors which must be considered. The program before the House was planned prior to the invasion of Korea. But the clash of arms in the Far East does not change the over-all plan in substance. Developments in Korea emphasize the urgency and the necessity of making it more effective as soon as possible. Mutual defense assistance program is a potent instrumentality for strengthening the nations that love liberty.

Our defenses should be immediately increased in the Pacific and elsewhere. We must exert our every effort in fully and adequately preparing this Nation for future emergencies. I said in a speech on foreign policy on April 1, 1948, that—

Most important of all planks in a realistic, bipartisan program on foreign policy is the achievement and the maintenance of adequate preparedness on the sea, on the land, and more especially in the air. Atomic supremacy and air supremacy by the United States must be realized at all costs. United States air supremacy is the only road to world peace. All the funds required to keep us the strongest military nation on the planet should be unhesitatingly appropriated by the Congress. Having done this, the Congress should insist that the armed services efficiently and effectively move to an early and full realization of this determined objective.

CONCLUSIONS

The Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949 and the bill we are considering today for the continuation of this program were carefully drawn to achieve given objectives as soon as possible. This was a mandate of the Congress. MDAP has been slow in developing. The tempo of this program must be increased at once. Its continuation is essential to our defense and security.

Through the mutual defense assistance program we are assisting our friends in becoming strong, and we are helping them construct military power so that they can make their contribution to the survival of the western world. It is becoming clearer day by day that the next few years will be exceedingly crucial in man's long struggle to acquire freedom. During the years immediately before us the issue between freedom and tyranny will be joined on many fronts. A hot war is possible in various areas. The future of the free world is now being decided.

To maintain the free world and the free way of life we must look to our defenses and do everything to increase our military effectiveness immediately. We are faced with a great challenge and a great opportunity to make an outstanding contribution to the construction of a decent international society. The passage of this measure now under discussion will bolster the West, psychologically and militarily. By swift concerted action the free nations can augment their military power to the point that a third world-wide conflict can perhaps be averted. Firm and resolute action on this measure and future similar measures will enable the West to maintain a democratic society. Time is running out. Quick action is imperative. Failure to arm ourselves sufficiently to meet any emergency would mean that we are not cognizant of the frightful times in which we live.

Strong, resolute, firm, and realistic policies, dedicated to world freedom, backed by the armed might of this Republic and the other democratic states, will guarantee a free world, a world in which nations can exist without fear of intimidation, of aggression, of enslavement, and of ultimate annihilation.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS].

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. Chairman, the mutual defense assistance pact now before us for consideration was adopted by your House Foreign Affairs Committee by a unanimous vote. Partisanship and politics never came into the discussion of this legislation. The urgency of this moment requires partisanship to be at least temporarily laid aside. I have never met the man whose hindsight is not superior to his foresight. This bill was reported from the Foreign Affairs Committee by 24 affirmative votes because everyone on that committee recognized that the bill is an essential piece of legislation if the freedom and security of the democracies of western Europe are to be preserved. It is essential if our own freedom and democracy are to be preserved. The men who sit in the Kremlin today have well-expressed ambitions to achieve for themselves world domination and world control. Their forces are world-wide and indivisible. Wherever and whenever they can bite off another group of peoples, another portion of land, they do so, and then they immediately turn those peoples and that land against freedom and democracy and use them and that land for further and additional staging grounds from which they continue their endeavors to destroy that for which the United States stands. Therefore, when we assist the democracies of Europe and Asia, when we help to strengthen them, to make them able to fight and resist Communist aggression, we are not only assisting them to preserve liberty but at the same time we improve our own position in this mortal struggle with the Communists. We know that today the battle which is going on in Korea—some people say it is not a war, but certainly we must all admit that while it may not be war it is at least a battle—that the Korean battle is just one facet—just one small operation—in this struggle for world domination by the Communists. It really is no more than a continuation of the battle that we waged 5 years ago against the forces of Hitler. The battle we are fighting in Korea is a continuation of the fight against dictatorship and totalitarianism.

It is important that we not at any time lose sight of the fact that the Communists have military forces all over the world poised and ready to move at a moment's notice. The mutual defense assistance pact is a recognition of the type and the kind of a world-wide conflict which we are in, and it is a recognition of the fact that while Korea is most important, that there are at the same time other important areas which must be defended. This legislation is this country's best and quickest way to help defend those other vital areas from being overrun.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this legislation is a continuation of legislation which was adopted by the Congress last year. It was bitterly fought last year in its original form by several Members of this Congress. I do not in any way wish to condemn those who opposed it last year. There are many Members of this great body who are sincere in their beliefs that we should adopt a policy of isolationism. They sincerely believe that we are wasting our substance and resources to attempt to assist other democracies in their fight against Communist aggression.

And then there is another group who fought this and other similar legislation. It is that group that somehow believed they saw some relationship between the Communist philosophy and so-called liberalism to which they give such loud verbal support. They were led to this belief because the Communists are smart enough to pick up a few desirable domestic programs and advocate them—then, having ensnared support from these well-intentioned people on those domestic issues, the Communists were able to sell them on some of their foreign programs without at any time our friends being aware of what was happening to them. This tactic is known in fishing as "chumming up." That is the practice which prevails in Florida where, in order to get the appetite of the fish exercised and whetted, you chop up bait and throw it overboard for a little while, then later on put a hook in some of that other bait and the fish unsuspectingly goes for it and is caught.

I am proud to have not been so beguiled. I am proud to have supported the Truman doctrine and been one of those who firmly believe that the only way we could ever win a peace, or get the Russians to agree to a peace was to make them see the futility of their aggression by our strength and resolve to resist them. I am proud to have raised my voice in pleading that we leave our troops in South Korea until we were sure the Communists had been withdrawn from North Korea. I am proud of having invited Gen. Claire Chennault to appear before our Foreign Affairs Committee in order to impress upon its membership the necessity for holding up the hand of Nationalist China in its resistance to communism. I am proud of being cosponsor of a resolution calling for a mutual assistance pact with the democracies of Asia and the United States in resisting the spread of communism. I am proud of my record in opposing Communist philosophy and expansion at each and every opportunity. There were times when it was not as popular to be against it, as it is today. However, the situation is changed now. The naked and brutal, the inexcusable and cynical aggression on the part of the men of the Kremlin on the South Koreans in order to further the cause of Communist domination has made everyone, I am sure, realize the real intention and the madness of the men of Moscow. We are all now suddenly awake to the danger. I think we all now believe this mutual defense assistance pact is at this time a must. Certainly it is absolutely essential that at the earliest possible moment we strengthen with military assistance those democratic allies of ours who, operating under the UN just as we are doing, desire to band together in order to protect their people and their government from dictatorship and to preserve their freedom. In the name of common sense and prudence this is the minimum at least that we can do.

I personally believe that we should even go further. When men are dying as they are in the battle of Korea, it is no time in my opinion for business as usual, pleasure as usual, or politics as usual, and certainly today American men are dying in the rice paddies of Korea; and they are dying in order to protect our freedom and our democracy. As grateful Americans who appreciate and understand the sacrifices which are being made, we should immediately gather our strength, firm up our resolve to see that those men now engaged in this battle have every physical, every economic, and every military advantage that it is possible for this Nation to give them. The time has come when we must call on industry, labor, management, and manpower to immediately undertake a program of mobilization for not only the battle which is now raging in Korea, but because of the prospects of a total war which can happen at any moment the Communist leadership decide on it. The gathering up of all of our resources, the readying of all of our people for an all-out effort will not necessarily signify the beginning of world war III, but on the contrary the evidence of a realistic, determined and unified American people resolved to go all the way to preserve freedom and democracy as a possibility of bringing about a peace. From the experience that we have had with the Russians since World War II, we must all agree that above everything else they are practical men. The men of the Kremlin, while pursuing the philosophy of communism, are nevertheless realists. If once they get it clear in their minds the understanding and appreciation of our resolve, our firm determination not only to fight, but our willingness to fight with every ounce of strength and manpower, and wealth that we have to fight with, they then can see, and probably for the first time, that a continuation of their present course of aggressive expansion will lead them to total war and the devastation and destruction which automatically follows.

Then, and only then, Mr. Chairman, will they as realists and practical men sit down and say to themselves "let's stop, let's look, let's listen." Then, and only then, in my opinion, do we in America, and we of the democratic nations throughout the world have the hope of averting world war III. We must by our acts prove that our fervor and devotion to democracy and our country are as strong and irresistible as is their enthusiasm to destroy it. We must make them see this. This military assistance program is an essential part of our determination and willingness to sacrifice in order to stop the encroachments on freedom. To win a peace this legislation is essential; to win a war, which let us hope and pray will never happen, this program is also essential. I am confident that every Member of this Congress, now that the mask has been stripped from the hearts of the men in the Kremlin will enthusiastically support this program of mutual defense.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FULTON].

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Chairman, this mutual defense assistance program is an important measure. It is not a measure that we should pass over lightly and think of as just the ordinary procurement program. This is the implementing of foreign policy of the United States for the security of the United States.

The people in the Congress and the people in the country often talk of foreign policy as if it were just a method of speaking about a subject which did not concern them, and which was simply theorizing about disturbing and entangling alliances. Foregn policy is only powerful and effective when it is implemented by the force of intelligent public opinion, and when it can be supported, if necessary, by the strength of arms and economic power of the country.

United States foreign policy should be based on clear principles of justice in dealing with the peoples of the world. It should not be used to support tottering imperialistic regimes which peoples are repudiating. The duty of the American people, of course, is to have the kind of a progressive program that will weld public opinion both in this country and the world behind it. As a corollary, we must have power behind our foreign policy. If necessary, when there is aggression, we must have the strength that these policies can be implemented.

One of my criticisms has been of the general foreign policy of the country, that we have not been accurate enough to assess the impact of fast-moving changes which are occurring in this revolutionary era. We have not been quick enough to realize that often the forces of world public opinion are shut out, and that the forces of world public opinion cannot effectively assist a particular policy so that it can be implemented because of restrictive conditions. In our country we insist that there be certain rules and conditions under which public opinion is free to operate, under which business, labor, and farmer, and production and distribution, can operate. We must insist on such conditions in the world regardless of boundaries, and aim our policies toward promoting world security for the average man today, and a future of hope for him and his family free from repression and exploitation.

Where the rules of public security break down, then the whole economic life of the local community breaks down and the same thing happens in the world. As I felt this program is important for our security if kept within proper limits, I am one of those that has pressed the program ever since its first introduction into the House.

As you know, this program passed the Senate on Friday, June 30 of this year. The House came back into session after a 10-day recess on July 10, 1950. The House Committee on Foreign Affairs, which has been on the job right straight through on this particular program, met immediately; in fact, on Tuesday, July 11 of this year, we reported the Senate bill out without any amendments. The people who had amendments felt that if we held this program up for even the time to consider amendments we were endangering the security of the United States and endangering this program throughout the world.

The people who are our friends among the democratic nations of the world are looking to see whether we are standing behind these United States commitments abroad, whether we mean what we say, that the world shall be a world where free people can live, whether we will provide that bland security force for our allies, and stand behind them; or whether, on the other hand, the United States is going to start into a policy of appeasement and retreat, both geographically and in the world of ideas, whether the United States will gradually pull in its horns and interests to the shores of this country and make the last stand, ourselves, isolated, friendless, and alone. In order to show that we really mean that the United States will implement the United Nations and assist the economic progress and implement the security of the free nations wherever they are, Congress must immediately take action on legislation of this kind in the House.

What has happened? You would think that when the House Committee on Foreign Affairs unanimously, 24 to 0, regardless of party, on a bipartisan bill, reported out a mutual defense assistance bill on July 11, that the House would take immediate action. On the contrary, the House Rules Committee did not consider this bill until yesterday, July 17. Here we are on July 18 of this year of our Lord 1950 trying to discuss this bill, a whole week after the time when it could have been considered if the Rules Committee had met, and accepted the responsibility of this legislation, and had taken the action to report it out so it could have been debated.

We in this House should have been working on this legislation either Tuesday afternoon of last week or Wednesday morning, July 12. The boys in Korea certainly do not have the time to put off their immediate actions for a week, and we in Congress in backing them and in backing the forces that are allied with us abroad should likewise not be able to take the time for 1 week to let a measure such as this lie idle.

I have asked the Rules Committee for a public explanation because, as I said earlier today, they are responsible to the House, and they are responsible to the country. There can be no committee of this Congress that avoids its responsibility. Someone from the Democratic administration on the Rules Committee should answer this to the country. Why was this vital military assistance program delayed for a week without action? Why, when this bill is so important to our security, was this allowed to lie on the table with nothing being done?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULTON. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. The gentleman speaks of responsibility. What has been done with respect to the Joint Chiefs of Staff who set forth one policy before the Committee on Foreign Affairs and now we find that policy completely reversed? Who is placing the responsibility for that sort of thing?

Mr. FULTON. The responsibility for the policies and the execution of the policies lies fundamentally with the administration.

Mr. GROSS. With the Commander in Chief, is that not correct, in the case of the Joint Chiefs of Staff?

Mr. FULTON. The foreign policy of the United States is placed by the Constitution under the President of the United States. Congress simply implements these policies.

Mr. GROSS. What has been done to remove these generals who gave the Foreign Affairs Committee contrary information?

Mr. FULTON. Several days ago on the floor I raised the question as to the adequacy of our intelligence.

There should be an explanation by the Central Intelligence Agency of this country as to whether intelligence is accurate because there is no doubt we have been deficient in having accurate information upon which to take action.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULTON. I am glad to yield, sir.

Mr. HERTER. The gentleman commented on why this matter was never taken up by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. FULTON. As to when it was.

Mr. HERTER. As an individual member of the Committee on Rules I might say my office telephoned regularly to the clerk of the committee to find out whether a meeting would be held to consider this very important matter.

Mr. FULTON. I am glad to have that, because I know the gentleman is doing his job and he thinks this military-aid legislation is important for United States security, too.

Mr. HERTER. After hearing the testimony of the members of the Committee on Forcign Affairs that of the authorization and appropriation made last year of $1,300,000,000 for this purpose, less than $100,000,000 had ever found its way overseas, it does not seem, from the point of view of urgency that the matter was quite as urgent as the gentleman makes it out.

Mr. FULTON. Events have proved the program was as urgent as I am making it out, because I have no excuse for any department of this Government failing to carry out the expressed will and determination of this Congress. As you will find through the hearings, there are various of us on the committee who have said time and again that these programs are important and have examined the Government witnesses regularly on why those items of security legislation were not being implemented. You will find there are many members on both sides of our committee, but especially the Republican side, who have cross-examined, saying, "Why the delay? Where is the delay? Is it in the State Department? Is it in the Department of Defense? Is it in Procurement? Is it in transportation? Why are not these policies of Congress carried out?"

I agree with the gentleman thoroughly that Congress generally has done its job, but the question is why have not these policies been properly implemented when Congress a year ahead of time pointed out the direction and laid down the fundamental purposes which the administration should carry out.

I want to thank the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HERTER] for his comments.

Mr. Chairman, the question comes up as to the particular implementation of the policy. One of the great criticisms of the program in the Communist world and one of the claimed alibis of the program by the Communists is that this is merely a dumping ground for useless and obsolete American military equipment, and chiefly equipment which has passed its present usability, left over from the last war.

In order to meet that question directly I have asked for an authoritative statement from the Office of Military Assistance to find just what type of equipment and the usability and modernity of the equipment is, which is being sent under this program. As of July 18, 1950, I have a letter of transmittal from Major General of the United States Army, L. L. Lemnitzer, the Director of the Office of Military Assistance, answering that question specifically and authoritatively. The general states this categorically:

> The equipment furnished under the mutual defense assistance programs is the same as that now in the hands of our own Armed Forces and it is the same equipment our own forces would use in the event of an immediate war. The equipment coming from our own stocks is thoroughly rehabilitated and placed in first-class operational condition with the latest and improved auxiliary equipment such as armament and electronics. Accordingly, all equipment being provided under the mutual defense assistance program, including aircraft (particularly B–29's), tanks, artillery, antiaircraft guns and fire-control equipment, is modern in every respect.
> As new equipment is developed for our own forces, this new equipment is included in the mutual defense assistance programs. Improvements in our present equipments are incorporated into all the equipment furnished under the mutual defense assistance program.
>
> The equipment being furnished is neither obsolete nor discarded but can be considered the most modern operational equipment available in quantity today for use by our own forces.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULTON. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. I want to compliment the gentleman as being the first speaker in 3 hours who has given us any information as to the particulars of this bill. In other words, what they are getting over there is about the same equipment we have in Korea today, which is far from modern equipment, apparently. They may be getting rehabilitated equipment, but certainly medium tanks and light tanks will not stand up to 60-ton tanks, which the Russians are using in Korea, so they are not getting modern equipment.

Mr. FULTON. As you know, the policy of the administration has changed. Previously the policy had been simply to implement the police force for internal security within Korea. It was not for the purpose of meeting major armed aggression against South Korea. We must see our boys in Korea and our allies receive first-class equipment, which I am now assured by General Lemnitzer, is being provided.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FULTON] has expired.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. FULTON. May I go to one further point, as to how this equipment that we are supplying is being received by the recipient countries.

I believe the Congress should not only look to see that the equipment is good, efficient, current, modern, usable, and effective, but we should also see whether the public in the recipient countries, are receiving the equipment well; whether it is being effectively integrated into their defense establishments or whether it is causing civil strife within those countries. The authoritative statement I have received today from the Director of the Office of Military Assistance is this, and I will quote this as the authoritative statement by the head of the program, General Lemnitzer——

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again? Can the gentleman give us any idea of how this equipment is being distributed as to countries?

Mr. FULTON. I will be glad to do that later, but I would like at this point to give this authoritative statement as to how it is being received upon being unloaded, generally, and then the committee can give you those details country by country at a later time in the debate. However, on the general proposition of the receipt of this equipment, General Lemnitzer, who is head of the administration of the Military Assistance, says:

Communist propaganda and, unfortunately, stories carried by the American press, would have you believe that mutual defense assistance equipment arriving in western Europe is received under a virtual state of siege. This is definitely not true.

The Communists made extensive plans to interfere with the unloading of equipment and to prevent its overland movement by means of organized resistance among dock and transportation workers and through acts of sabotage. Thus far they have failed completely. The countries concerned have thus far demonstrated their determination to prevent such interference and the security measures taken by them have been very effective. At all ports the cooperation of the non-Communist dock workers has been outstanding. They have voluntarily unloaded the equipment and are continuing to do so with the arrival of each vessel at European ports. The police and troop protection which has been provided these workers by the governments concerned has permitted the matériel to be unloaded and to proceed to its destination in an orderly fashion.

The only case where equipment has not been unloaded by non-Communist longshoremen and dock workers was in the case of the shipment of naval aircraft from Norfolk, Va., to Bizerte, Tunisia, since this aircraft was loaded at a United States naval base and unloaded at a French naval air station at Bizerte. Both the loading in the United States and the unloading at Bizerte was accomplished by military personnel since civilian unloading personnel and facilities were not available under these circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FULTON] has again expired.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS].

Mr. JAVITS. First of all I want to refer to what one of my colleagues, Mr. GROSS of Iowa, just said about something which I think is very pertinent, and to which I wish to address myself. He said that my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. Fulton] said the first enlightening thing about this bill that has been said during the course of this debate. I propose to confine myself to the bill, as did my colleague from Pennsylvania. Perhaps it was because my colleague from Pennsylvania talked about the particular thing in which the gentleman from Iowa was interested and about which he wanted to hear that he made that remark; but I, too, would like to stick to the facts, not alone upon this bill but upon the situation which this bill is designed to correct. For I think that at a time like this, when we are addressing ourselves to questions of high policy we are inclined to overlook what a profoundly difficult situation we face in very realistic terms.

The Orient, as anyone knows who has been there, is a vast place with enormous populations, and enormous populations which have extremely low standards of living. And so, before we lull ourselves into a sense of false security about what we have accomplished when we drive the North Koreans back above the thirty-eighth parallel, which I am sure we will do, I would like to call my colleagues' attention to the very realistci words of people who are experts in this business, the British, which I read from an issue of the London Times of July 15. I shall quote this and I think every Member should take it very much to heart, for it states the problem which we face in the best and shortest terms that I know:

Events there have several lessons for the Western Powers. For one thing, they underline the need for political and economic changes in southeast Asian countries to counter the Communist appeal. Although the goal of the Communist challenge is dictatorship, the Asian Communists rally their following by cries of: "Land to the peasants," "Efficient government," and "National independence." The Western Powers must be careful to avoid the charge of supporting backward or corrupt regimes, and they must supply the common need for improvement of land and farming methods, for more consumer goods, and for better production and marketing of the staple foods. More money must be spent on both arms and economic help, or aggressors will be invited into areas that are now both rich and weak.

I ask you to ponder that statement very very carefully. This is no superficial job; it is not going to be finished by the driving back of the North Koreans beyond the thirty-eighth parallel, or indeed by the conquest of North Korea; it requires a social, economic, and political concept equal in size to the task.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. Nor can we hope to be successful if we put this man Rhee back as President of the Republic of Korea.

Mr. JAVITS. That is exactly the sort of question the Times was addressing itself to, the political questions in the Far East.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there has been a far-eastern policy, a decisive far-eastern policy; it has not been made by the State Department; it has not been made by the President, but it has been made right here in the Congress, and I think from present indications the Executive and the administration are finally getting the point of the policy and finally getting aboard it, and I hope that they will not again be too little or too late.

I think that we must have in the Far East a program for economic cooperation so that free peoples may help themselves to have better standards of living and better social conditions just like we have in Europe. Our program in western Europe was successful in the defeat of the Communists, it absolutely and decisively defeated them in the two western European powers of Italy and France. That program was the European recovery program. Let us not forget that, and as men of experience let us apply a good program when it works.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. The gentleman says we defeated communism in France when 183 members of the National Assembly of France are Communists?

Mr. JAVITS. We have, considering the alternative we faced of having France taken over by the Communists.

Mr. GROSS. When the Communists constitute the largest political party in the National Assembly?

Mr. JAVITS. I say that advisedly. As a result of the European recovery program there is a majority of the members of the Chamber who were not Communists. Without it both Italy and France could have been under Communist governments—just so close were they to it in 1946.

Mr. GROSS. But they are still powerful enough to have caused the collapse of the government twice in 48 hours during the last 2 weeks.

Mr. JAVITS. But they were not powerful enough to stop the coalition that supports a government of the middle of Pleven or keep him from taking power; and he is on the side of democracies, not of Moscow.

Our far-eastern program should be based on economic cooperation and on security for the participating peoples. The administration must try to get the nations and states of the Pacific together and to devise, as we did in Europe, a program for economic cooperation which would raise the standards of living of their peoples and give them a material as well as a spiritual stake in anticommunism.

Now, the Foreign Affairs Committee, as you will find on page 3 of the report on this bill, is again perfecting our far-eastern policy, blazing the trail which the administration if it has the wisdom must and should follow. The Foreign Affairs Committee unanimously decided that what it wants is a Pacific Pact, a Pacific Pact on the model of the Atlantic Pact, which will enable these powers of the Pacific which are today admittedly weak in terms of their own physical security, to lean on each other and to draw strength from each other.

It is true there no longer is "a white man's burden" in the Far East and there should not be. The Pacific nations and free peoples there are perfectly able to stand on their own feet and we should be the first to recognize that, but the way to recognize that is to dignify their defensive power and strength as we have dignified the defensive power and the defensive strength of Europe by an Atlantic Pact. So we must dignify it in the Pacific by a Pacific Pact.

If, as the administration tells us, an invitation is required of the Pacific states to get together and to draw upon each other for their own defense, I say to it, and I hope many Members of the Congress in the next 2 days will join with me in saying that from the Congress of the United States, the representatives of the American people, this is the invitation and we devoutly hope they will accept it.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. VORYS. Just going backward, the record for the Pacific Pact found in the report at page 3, the gentleman having introduced the motion, was based upon a bipartisan statement of congressional policy now found in the findings and declaration of policy of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act?

Mr. JAVITS. The gentleman is exactly correct.

Mr. VORYS. Those were preceded by a bipartisan action by both Houses of Congress, going back to the China Aid Act of 1948; so that we have had a bipartisan congressional policy for the Far East for a number of years. The only trouble is it has never been implemented by the Executive.

Mr. JAVITS. Exactly. Certainly the disposition which is shown on this bill by its unanimous report from the committee, and by the acceptance of the bill without amendments being offered in our own Foreign Affairs Committee, and by what I hope will be a resounding vote of support for this bill tomorrow, shows that we in the Congress are prepared for a Pacific Pact and are prepared to back it.

We often underestimate our own strength, the power of the democratic ideal, and the power of our own allies. It is true the Russians have captured China with its 400,000,000 people and that we have suffered a severe reverse in China. But let us see what support for liberty there is in the Pacific. There are Australia, New Zealand, Indonesia, the Philippines, Malaya, India, Pakistan, Burma, Afghanistan, Siam, Indochina, Korea, and China on Formosa, in order to make up a Pacific Pact. There is great power in the Pacific peoples who are still on the side of freedom if we only have the sense and the judgment to marshal them today.

There is one other point which is very important in appraising what we are doing. I think it is high time that we got very realistic about the magnitude of what we are engaged in. Little, to my mind, has vindicated more the action which we took in Europe in backing the Atlantic Pact which this bill to the tune of a billion dollars is to implement—and let us not forget that we are implementing the arming of the western European nations in this bill with another $1,000,000,000—than reading the papers this morning to find that when the United Nations needed aid for the enforcement of military sanctions in Korea, immediately after us are coming the Brussels Pact nations—Great Britain, France, Belgium, the Netherlands, and Luxemburg. It is they who will support us; it is they who have the ideal of freedom so seriously in their hearts. It is still they with the greatest military capability in being in the free world after us. So let us not be confused about where the powerhouse of democracy still is. We want it created in the Pacific, too, so that the powerhouse of democracy is on both shores of the Atlantic, and of the Pacific.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. What assurance does the gentleman have that we are going to get this help he is talking about? We are not getting it in Korea.

Mr. JAVITS. Let us not be hasty. We have been fighting in Korea for about 2 weeks. We were the ones who had forces on the spot in Japan and were able to get the jump. We did the right thing. We did get the jump and we did get in there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, based upon reports we have already seen and the fact we know the mettle of our allies in western Europe, we will get the necessary units, the necessary help which we want, both in ground forces and otherwise. Also, I remind the gentleman from Iowa that the British Navy's units and the Australian Air Forces' units were immediately put at our disposal and are being used. I have confidence now we will get ground-force assistance from these sources, as well.

Mr. GROSS. When?

Mr. JAVITS. Promptly, that is the most that one can say. They are meeting on it right now, as the gentleman knows from reading the morning papers, and that was the point of my statement in pointing out that the great military capability that resided in that area of the world.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield to the gentlewoman from California.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. New Zealand and the Canadian and the Netherland forces are also at work.

Mr. JAVITS. Yes; that is true, and I appreciate that correction.

I would just like to come to this last point in terms of realism. The United States has an annual income of $250,000,000,000. That is the totality of our production. That means that every man, woman, and child in the United States has generally a per capita income of somewhere between $1,200 and $1,500 a year. Let us compare that with those next in line, the peoples of western Europe, who are a numerous people and next in line after us in industrial capability. They have a population of over 200,000,000 people, with an annual income of $170,000,000,000 in terms of production, somewhere in the area of $400 to $600 per capita. Once you get beyond that—which takes in practically the whole world with the exception of Canada, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, and a few South American countries, all with relatively small populations—but once you get beyond that for practically the whole population of the rest of the world, you are in the area of a per capita income of something like $100 a year or less. When we talk about the appeal of communism and the counterappeal which we must make if we are to decisively defeat communism, let us never forget those figures. Let us never forget that, in terms of standards of living, the people of the world have a very long way to go.

Now, the whole world respects American industrial power, and if they did not respect it, they could not help but respect it, based upon the very figures which I have just quoted and the standard of living which it has given to the United States. But there is a big fallacy which we are still laboring under in this country, which is very strange for businessmen, that for one reason or another that we really are stretching ourselves too far considering the magnitude of the job and the magnitude of our resources, to improve the standard of living of the other peoples of the world, essential though it is if we are to defeat communism, and deliver the goods if we are to show up Communist promises as the lies they are. There is that fallacy in the thinking of many people in our country that somehow or other it will break us or bankrupt us or make us poor or bleed us white to do the job we must do to save ourselves and mankind from Communist slavery.

We are great businessmen, but in this critical instance we seem to forget that business is always best on a busy street; that we sell the most to people who are prosperous; that where there are high standards of living there is a greater income for everybody.

We do not seem to realize that that is the only way in which the enormous economic burden of reconstructing the world's economy and of raising of the standards of living of terribly distressed peoples is possible and that the armaments which we and the rest of the free world need, and which I believe the President will recommend tomorrow and which he should have recommended a year ago, that all of that cannot be carried on for the time it will take solely on the basis of the economy of the United States; that it can only be carried on in terms of a world economy, and that instead of our exports and imports of $12,000,000,000 a year, now largely financed by Marshall-plan money, it should be for us and on the same scale for other free peoples, $40,000,000,000 a year on a normal basis. Then we will have a world economy that can sustain the kind of a job which we have to do in the world.

Again I repeat, it is amazing to me that Americans, skilled in business, do not realize that business is best on a busy street. Take a look at the 10 biggest corporations in the United States today. In 1929, a boom year, they had individual resources in the hundreds of millions each. They include General Motors, United States Steel, General Electric, and others of similar size. Today their resources are in terms of $5,000,000,000 for General Motors and down from that. All of these problems, both of economic reconstruction and of assuring security to the free world have to be looked at in those terms. We are living in a truly new world; if we do not recognize that we can lose, we can lose in this struggle against communism, and nobody knows that better than the people of Asia. But, if we look at this world in terms of completely new conceptions and new figures, then I am confident that the world can have the most glorious centuries ahead that it has ever had in all of its history, and that the free peoples of Asia and elsewhere, will be with us because we are the hope for a decent and peaceful world and because we are right.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. JACKSON] who has just returned from a mission to Latin America for the committee.

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Ohio has stated, I have just returned from 3 weeks in Central America and Mexico on a committee mission intended to develop the present situation with respect to the military, political, and economic postures now obtaining in those countries.

I am very happy to say that during the course of that trip we found a great and almost universal expression of friendship and good will for the United States.

I was surprised upon my return to Washington and to the House to find that those of us who, a year ago opposed economic aid to Korea on grounds which we considered to be valid, were in effect being charged with having sabotaged South Korea and American interests in that part of the world.

Many years ago a great American said:

> Gentlemen may cry peace, peace, but there is no peace. The war has actually begun. The next gale that sweeps from the north will bring to our ears the crash of resounding arms. Our brothers are already in the field. Why stand we here idle?

Those words might well be spoken today on the floor of the Congress. We are no longer engaged in a cold war but in a war that is as hot as war can ever become.

It is useless to berate at this moment, it is useless to indulge in recriminations as to who is responsible for the position in which our men now find themselves in the rice paddies of Korea, but it is very important that today's RECORD show certain warnings, certain things that were said on the floor of this House a year ago as to what might reasonably be expected if we embarked upon a course of action such as the one that was proposed at that time.

In spite of warnings and in spite of storm signals which were flown over the floor of this House, we proceeded along a course of action which many of us considered in all honesty to be a course of folly. We set up in the form of meager economic assistance a showcase for democracy in the last place any thinking man would have tried to establish such a showcase. There were warnings then that the Russian bear would, when the proper moment came, put his foot through the glass, and that is precisely what has happened. Korea was a soft spot, and in the Russian probings for soft spots it was inevitable that Korea's weakness would be found, and that in due time 2 or 5 or 11 divisions would plunge across the thirty-eighth parallel to undo the good we were trying to do, and garner the prize being dangled under the Communist nose. However, that is largely water over the dam and under the bridge.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON of California. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEATING. That may be water over the dam, and I quite agree with the gentleman that we must now look forward and not backward.

But I think the record should contain at this point a commendation of the prophetic utterance of the gentleman now addressing us. The words in the minority report on economic aid to Korea, which were uttered by the gentleman from California, as we read them now, were a complete and accurate forecast of exactly what has happened. The gentleman said that economic aid to Korea would be useless unless accompanied by military assistance. Certainly events have proven that statement. I think the gentleman now speaking is entitled to our highest commendation for the leadership which he took in what has now turned out to be the proper course.

Mr. JACKSON of California. I thank the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON of California. I yield.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. I also want to join in commending the gentleman for the minority report which he wrote at that time when he pointed out to the Congress and used the phrase:

> The House should be aware of these facts; that already aggression was beginning back of the thirty-eighth parallel; already Soviet advisers were engaged; and that without the accompaniment of adequate military force, the use of economic assistance could only enhance the prize in the eyes of the aggressor.

I would like to point out here that on page 42 of the committee report there is not only confirmation of the gentleman's prophecy as to economic aid, but there is an admission that military aid voted in connection with the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949 did not reach Korea. The words used are:

> No deliveries of any consequence have been made as yet.

And it goes on to say:

> The committee regrets that so little of the aid voted has reached Korea before the attack.

But worse than that is the admission, as the gentleman is aware, that it was not intended to supply sufficient military aid to repel an aggression because it is specifically stated on this same page that the military aid was to preserve internal security; prevent border raids; and as a byproduct to deter armed attack or other aggression from North Korea.

Does the gentleman agree that taking that into consideration plus the testimony of General Lemnitzer and others before this committee that it was intended to leave South Korea as a mere sitting duck in the presence of the greedy Russian bear?

Mr. JACKSON of California. I thank the gentleman. In response to his question I can only say that in my own mind during the hearings there was never any question as to what we intended to do from a military standpoint in the case of attack upon South Korea—that was to leave it. I invite the attention of every Member of this body to the remarks made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH] in which he quotes time and time again from witnesses before the committee of the intention not to defend South Korea in case of attack. But all of that aside we are now confronted with the reality of war which we have tried to avert by every honest means. We have leaned over backward in an effort to appease the Soviet. We have done everything that any reasonable nation might be expected to do and much more besides.

I, too, am a veteran of the last war. I am also a member of the minority party in the House of Representatives. But I am first of all a citizen of this country, one who loves it very deeply and one who has a deep and abiding regard for its institutions and ideals. Although I raised my voice last year against the folly that has proven to be Korea and although at that time, as many of us did who cast our votes in good conscience against the proposal, I did everything in my power to divert what appeared to be a disastrous step, I submitted in the American way to the will of the majority. However, again I think the record should be clear on several points. I read from the minority report which was referred to by the gentleman from New York. I quote:

> As desirable as are the aims of those who would furnish economic assistance to Korea at this time, there are factors which indicate that such a program is foredoomed to failure. Korea is hopelessly outflanked by the adjacent land mass of China, and the peninsula has no connecting link with any friendly continental power. Every ton of supplies contemplated to be furnished under the terms of this legislation must be transported vast distances, only to be put down in the midst of a complex and daily shifting Pacific picture, in which the rapid and undeterred spread of communism is the salient feature.

And again:

> Every authority who has testified before the Committee on Foreign Affairs with respect to the Korean situation has acknowledged the fact that there could be no effective defense against an armed aggression originating in the northern half of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. JACKSON of California—

> Nor has any satisfactory evidence been produced to indicate that a determined political attack could be long withstood.

And again, and this has reference to the announcement that Soviet soldiers were engaged in an action on the Ongjin Peninsula as long as a year ago:

> This development may well presage the launching of a full-scale military drive across the thirty-eighth parallel. Unless this Nation is prepared to meet force with comparable force, economic assistance cannot of itself insure the safety or the integrity of South Korea.

The character of aid proposed at that time was the root of the opposition of the Members who opposed the bill. The thought of sending hydroelectric plants, mine equipment, and other capital investments to enhance the prize to be taken by the aggressor without adequate military assistance to cover, defend, and protect those supplies was the only reason we opposed the legislation at that time.

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON of California. I yield.

Mr. HOEVEN. Of course, the propaganda mills are already grinding, and Members of the Congress who voted against the so-called economic aid to Korea bill last January are being accused of having been against national defense and the defense of Korea. I am glad the gentleman has called attention to the minority report which specifically clears up that matter.

Is it not a fact that there was not a penny of money in that bill for the defense of Korea; not one cent for arms or ammunition? Everything that was authorized to be appropriated was for capital improvements, which it is quite evident now, would have been taken over by the Communists.

Mr. JACKSON of California. The bill was an economic-assistance measure, which was designed to rehabilitate railroads, open entry to coal mines, install hydroelectric plants, and generally rehabilitate heavy industry in South Korea.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON of California. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I congratulate my friend from California on his excellent statement. As the gentleman knows, I was one of those who signed the minority report on Korea, feeling, as the gentleman felt, that economic aid without military aid was a wasteful performance especially since the military and naval witnesses who came before our committee testified that Korea is not only indefensible but of slight strategic importance. Nevertheless, I voted for the aid to Korea bill mainly in the forlorn hope that something might be done, and because I favored aid to the people of Formosa, I thought that we should do what we could to buoy up their spirits. This aid provided the only hope that was left to the people of Korea. I felt that Korea could not be saved by our aid alone, but I did not want to help in underwriting their doom. I felt that we were responsible for the formation of this young Republic and therefore we must at least give them a chance. Certainly, the distinguished gentleman from California courageously anticipated what has happened. I congratulate him on his foresight and on the remarks which he has addressed to us.

Mr. JACKSON of California. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. JACKSON of California. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I think there should be added to the comment which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HOEVEN] made that not one dollar of the military aid which we voted for Korea, according to the evidence, has ever arrived there. That was voted long before the economic aid, so that there has been nothing done to implement the action of Congress.

Mr. JACKSON of California. I think one important point that every Member of Congress should realize is that the decision to aid and assist South Korea was a diplomatic decision and not a military decision.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON of California. I yield.

Mr. McDONOUGH. The record will also show that the rule for the bill which the gentleman is referring to was adopted by the Rules Committee on September 27, 1949, and it laid in the House until January 19, when the bill was enacted. In other words, during that interim the Syngman Rhee government had been elected, and if there had been any intention on the part of the administration to help, the bill should have been acted upon before we recessed in October 1949.

Mr. JACKSON of California. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON of California. Very briefly, to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I just wanted to ask the gentleman if he was not impressed by the fact that the military aid which we voted for China had apparently been sabotaged? Did not that seem to indicate the entire futility of trying to help these countries?

Mr. JACKSON of California. I would say to the gentleman from Maine that I have long since ceased being surprised at anything. But, having been an unwilling passenger on this wave of shortsighted idealism, I accept the inevitable outcome of folly. As a veteran and a citizen to whom the safety of this Nation is of paramount consideration, I accept the grisly facts which have led to bloodshed.

I opposed the arms-aid bill last year. It is my intention to support it this year. We are in such position that our national security and our national safety are at stake, and I cannot in the light of that oppose the pending legislation.

Circumstances attendant on an abysmal failure properly to evaluate the Korean situation has brought us into war, and it is a war that may well go on for the next two decades. Let no one think for an instant that this is not war, hot war of the hottest variety, and a war in which hundreds and possibly thousands of American men are going to lose their lives. Those men are dying this instant because we attempted to meet the threat of bayonets and 60-ton tanks with tons of manure and garden seed.

The time has come for us to realize that the Soviet Union and its satellites intend the destruction of every constitutional form of government in this world which does not coincide in every respect with the political philosophy of the Soviet Union and with the Communist manifesto written in a Paris attic 102 years ago. The time has come to write our own manifesto, a manifesto which will be unmistakable to the aggressors and to the American people, that we intend to meet force with force, weapon with weapon, on any front where freedom is threatened. Unless we do this we shall continue to take one step forward and two backward to the eventual destruction of all that we hold dear.

I am supporting this legislation not because I have any confidence in the judgment of the prophets who have been consistently wrong or who have consistently fumbled the ball, but only because I am one of 150,000,000 Americans in a fight not for social security, but in a fight for ultimate survival.

At the proper time during the course of the amending procedure on this bill I shall offer again the amendment I offered last year which will open negotiation for air bases in western Europe on which shall be mounted units of the American Air Force armed with the most devastating weapons at our command. In the moment one foot of an aggressor is placed across the frontier of any friendly nation this force should be in a position to take off from bases on the Continent and wreak whatever havoc they can in the ranks of the greatest aggression since Adolph Hitler.

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MARSHALL].

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, I was one of the few Members of this House—and the only Democrat—who voted to oppose passage of the recent so-called tax revision bill, H. R. 8920.

Recent developments in the Far East throw new light on this bill. We have committed our troops to enforce the United Nations cease-fire order. In so doing, we have committed the financial resources of the United States to support these troops. It is now apparent that H. R. 8920 ought to be shelved and a new bill substituted by the House of Representatives.

The bill passed by the House did contain provisions necessary to plug obvious loopholes in our present tax laws. These provisions ought to be incorporated in another bill and passed immediately. If we are to maintain our financial stability in the present crisis, it is imperative that we have additional funds.

It is not a popular thing for me or for any Member of Congress to talk about additional revenue in an election year. If speaking frankly and honestly and being true to my convictions means defeat in the coming elections, so be it. I would be a coward to my conscience and a traitor to my country were I to pursue another course.

The American people are prepared to face the facts. There has been overwhelming support of our action in Korea. There is no war hysteria. But there is a stern realization that this will be a hard struggle. There are serious questions about the prospects ahead and we need to face them squarely.

Whether we want to or not, we are building a war economy. Our recent history has demonstrated that a war economy leads to the attendant dangers of rising debt and inflationary trends. To check both a rising debt and inflation, we must pass sound revenue laws. We know the tremendous costs of war. And even the police action we have now undertaken is an expensive one, particularly since it is necessary to build our own strength in the interest of national defense and security.

Had we taken early steps to insure sufficient revenue during World War I and World War II, a larger part of these wars could have been paid out of the increased national income. To postpone the day of payment is not only a dangerous fiscal policy; it is an ungrateful one. We send young men to war and then ask those who return to pay for their own war during the height of their earning power through taxes. We have made this mistake twice. Must we make it again?

Our national income increased from $41,700,000,000 in 1932 to $221,000,000,000 in 1949. Our national debt rose from $19,400,000,000 in 1932 to $251,600,000,000 in 1949. It is true that the cost of World War II boosted our debt to this peak, but we can see now that some of this might have been avoided. Therefore, I repeat that we ought to face the facts realistically and enact a tax bill that will produce revenue sufficient to meet the costs of national defense and security in these troubled times.

Since the end of World War II our military costs have remained steadily high. We have been spending one out of every three dollars spent by the Federal Government for defense. Only a few years before the last war we were spending about one out of ten dollars for military preparedness.

Viewed another way, in the recent years we have been spending six cents of every dollar of national income for military defense. During World War II, the United States spent up to 95 percent of its total budget to carry on a Global War. In terms of national income, about 50 cents of every dollar earned was spent to win the war.

But this was at the peak of World War II when our efforts demanded every human and physical resource at our command. We again need to make this effort now to avoid another war too terrible to comprehend. Foresight will help us to meet the costs in money without bringing disaster to our economy.

To meet the new emergency with still bigger and faster deficits would be folly. It would mean defeat at home while trying to protect and promote peace and security abroad. A healthy fiscal policy is as much a part of national defense in the world now as armaments. If we are not strong financially we will fall prey to weaknesses at home that will make security impossible.

We know that it will now be necessary to increase the volume of defense spending. This increase will be reflected in both the dollar volume of armament spending and in the proportion of the budget devoted to that spending. Unless honest efforts are made now to meet the additional needs of the United States, we will be building a bigger deficit.

More debt and more inflation might well be the fifth column that will undermine our country. To allow these twin evils to run rampant might well nullify any military victory that we can gain. We need only to look to the countries of Europe to know that financial ruin is the breeding ground of totalitarianism. To fight the false philosophies threatening the peace of the world on battlefronts, while making breeding grounds for them at home would be defeat.

This is one of the most serious problems now facing this Congress. God forbid that we shirk our responsibility and again find that we have done too little too late. Gentlemen, I cannot stress too strongly the need for a sound tax policy now to meet these problems squarely and honestly.

Because the human mind is permitted to choose evil, we have among us those who seek profit from the misery of their fellowmen. We have among us the weak and the men of little faith who would shirk their share of suffering. These are the profiteers and the hoarders, some big and some small, but all traitors to themselves and to their country.

These are the realities of life and society must depend upon government to protect it from this insidious element threatening the common good. The moral bankruptcy of the few can well work grave harm on the good of the many.

None of us want controls, whether political or economic. But we know from sad experience that some economic control is necessary in time of crisis to protect us from ourselves—from the greed which drives men to make fortunes from the blood and tears of their fellow citizens. War wrecks death and suffering upon great masses of people—but it also makes great fortunes for those few who feed on the misfortunes of others. World War I and World War II meant death to our young men—it also meant millions to those who trade in death for their own profit.

Modern war demands the effort of every citizen. Peace in modern times demands the effort of every citizen. Just as the soldier at the front must be prepared for the ultimate sacrifice, so the citizen at home must be prepared to sacrifice at least those material goods which would be empty frills without the freedom which is the natural climate of happiness for man.

The increased expenditures necessary to carry our efforts to secure the peace to a successful conclusion could lead not only to debt but to the kind of inflation we have already witnessed. A wise tax policy can be a major move toward warding off the evil of inflation. Used with moderate economic controls it could protect us from the decline in dollar value which contributed so enormously to the costs of both World War I and World War II. We know that these costs were inflationary costs and many generations of Americans will be called upon to pay them.

Good tax policy has always been recognized as an effective brake on inflation. We knew this in World War II but we were too late and we stopped too early. The result was the 57-cent dollar of 1948. Must we make the same mistake again? Must we wait until the apparent has occurred before we learn that foresight is better than hindsight?

Already hoarders and profiteers with an eye to the Korean struggle are pushing up prices and hoarding the materials and resources we will need to force the hand of those who plotted the unprovoked aggression in Korea. I hope we do not wait until extreme controls and extreme taxes are necessary, Mr. Chairman. Now is the time to adopt a sound "middle course" policy of revenue raising and economic controls. Unless we are prepared to enact moderate, sensible legislation now we will find ourselves forced to enact extreme legislation after the harm has been done.

I only ask that we face the facts. Certainly we can do that much. We are not different from the Americans who fought at Valley Forge, at Gettysburg, at the Argonne, or at Iwo Jima—then, let us do honestly what needs to be done.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARSHALL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FULTON. Did the gentleman support the Mutual Defense Assistance Act program last year? Did he vote for or against this program last year?

Mr. MARSHALL. On aid to Europe?

Mr. FULTON. The Mutual Defense Assistance program, the extension of which we are working on now?

Mr. MARSHALL. I supported the recovery programs. I have supported every recovery program that the House has had brought before it. I have not supported the military assistance program.

Mr. FULTON. The gentleman voted against that last year when this bill first came up. Did the gentleman support the bill for the 70-group Air Force as against the 48-group Air Force?

Mr. MARSHALL. I want to assure the gentleman I did not. As far as I am able to determine so far that was entirely the wise policy to follow.

Mr. FULTON. The gentleman voted against the 70-group Air Force program last year?

Mr. MARSHALL. Yes. All action to date points to the wisdom of that vote. Our productive resources are in better shape. Up to this time the 48-unit Air Force has been all this country could support. Furthermore, military action demonstrates the adequacy of air strength. It has been our ground forces that have needed more and better armaments.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. FULTON. Was the gentleman the only Democrat that did that in the House, too?

Mr. MARSHALL. I was the only Member of the House who did that.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARSHALL. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. JACOBS. I want to compliment the gentleman on what he has said here this afternoon. I want to compliment the gentleman from Minnesota upon what he is saying here. Regardless of how he may have voted on any other bill does not preclude him from calling these vital matters to the attention of the House. It is our duty in this House to have the courage to levy sufficient taxes to raise the revenue to pay for this war as we fight it rather than to leave it for future generations to shoulder. I compliment the gentleman. He is exactly right.

Mr. MARSHALL. I thank the gentleman from Indiana. I would like to say to the Members of the House that I have not apologized or tried to find an excuse for any votes that I have cast in the past.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARSHALL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EBERHARTER. The gentleman from Minnesota is entitled to the thanks of the Members of Congress and the country at large for the remarks he has just made. It seems to me we ought to consider seriously the immediate imposition of additional taxes on the American people, both on business and personal incomes. We should not wait until we have spent millions of dollars and then try to impose a tax. I think it should be done right away.

I seriously question also the decision not to go forward and pass at least a portion of the tax bill the House has already passed and let it become law, especially that portion pertaining to loopholes and that portion pertaining to an increase in corporate taxes. It would have the effect of curbing inflation. It would make business and individuals in the country realize that we are in a state of emergency.

The longer we put it off the more painful it is going to be. I sincerely hope that what the gentleman has stated this afternoon will get widespread publicity. I know that when the people begin to think about it it will have the approval of the vast majority of the people of the country.

Mr. MARSHALL. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARSHALL. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I think the gentleman has made an excellent speech. The fact that he changed his mind has made me think a great deal more of him, because I was told when I was a little boy that a wise man changes his mind and a fool never does.

Mr. MARSHALL. I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts. I have supported the reorganization plans and other measures of economy. I have felt that we ought to have a balanced budget and to that end I believe we ought to have a realistic revenue policy. My efforts in that regard have been consistent. I voted against military aid. I'm going to support this program because to my mind we are at war and are viewing the situation as a war measure. We did not start this agressive action but it will be up to us to end it.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD].

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, naturally I favor the passage of this bill to extend further military assistance to certain nations of western Europe, the Middle East, and the Far East—the mutual defense assistance program. When the first economic recovery program bill came before us in the Eightieth Congress, it was generally presented as a thing we ought to do out of charity or humanitarianism or for solely economic reasons. It was argued that we ought to help the people and rehabilitate the industries in the countries in Europe which had suffered physical devastation during the war. The RECORD will show, I think, that I was the only Member of Congress who said in the debate then—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 3872, March 31, 1948—that we could not justify it primarily on such a basis—> that such measures as this (ECA and China aid) could be justified in this present world situation and in the present straitened state of America's finances and supplies only if they are essential from the standpoint of the security of the Nation.

> We had hoped it would be an alternative to a military policy. Six months ago it perhaps could have been. But world events and Communist aggression have advanced so rapidly that now it probably is more in support of a military policy than an alternative to one.

The bill before us today deals with that military policy. It is designed to strengthen our allies. It is not that our Government is under any obligation to use our taxpayers' money to help England, France, Turkey, China, Korea, or any other country. But we do owe it to our own people to try to get for them the maximum of security. And they do not have real security in a world where free nations are being taken over one by one by the Soviet Union and its fifth columns.

So I was relieved when a year later the administration finally came along with a military aid program. As between the economic and military assistance programs, you cannot say that one is more important than the other. Both are necessary if either is to succeed.

I should like to approach the problems we face today as a result of the Korean invasion much as a doctor approaches the body of a patient at the autopsy table. That is never a pleasant task; yet every physician knows that practically all the progress we have ever made in medicine came from honest examination of our mistakes. The doctor may have been ever so careful in the examination which led him to the diagnosis that the patient's trouble was, for example, in the stomach. He may have called in half a dozen expert consultants who also decided after careful examination that the trouble was in the stomach. He may even have had a propaganda agency to convince all the relatives that the trouble was in the stomach. But if, when the man is dead and the doctor examines him at the autopsy table, he finds that the trouble was in the liver—then that is all there is to it, it was in the liver.

A doctor conducts an autopsy, not to recriminate, because that does not get him anywhere; not so much to determine who was to blame as to try to find out, if he can, what was to blame. What went wrong with his thinking, that he missed some signs or misinterpreted other signs which the autopsy explains as plain as day? He wants to learn so that in the next similar case he will not make the same mistakes again.

Just so, in the grave crisis our country faces today, we need to conduct if not an autopsy, at least an exploratory operation, in order to discover if we can how we made the grave miscalculations that have brought us for the second time in one decade to the brink of a world war.

Both times it began with the very same error: Failure to realize how important it is to our own security that the opposite shores of the Pacific as well as of the Atlantic be in the hands of friends instead of enemies; more specifically, failure to understand that it is imperative to the security of the United States and to the establishment of peace and order and security in the world that the nations of Asia be independent and friendly to ourselves and the other democratic free nations of the world, instead of organized and controlled either by Japan's totalitarian militarism or by the Soviet Union's new imperialism—which is no less raw and cruel imperialism because it is called liberation or some other fancy slogan.

For almost 100 years our forefathers did not make the mistake we have made. They saw that the best guaranty of our security on our west was to have there an independent China friendly to ourselves. They supported whatever government was in China, whether good, bad, or indifferent, rather than let China's potential might come under any outside power that might be hostile to ourselves. They recognized China as important to us not because of any sentimental concern for the Chinese but because of the geography of the Pacific area. If China were independent and friendly, then we were secure on our west, because neither of the two Asiastic nations which conceivably might threaten us, Japan and Russia, could move in our direction if in its rear, in the case of Japan, or on its long southern flank, in the case of Russia, there was a strong independent China friendly to the United States.

That was our basic policy and it was sound. We got into trouble in Asia only when we abandoned it in 1931 after Japan invaded Manchuria. To the credit of Mr. Hoover and Mr. Stimson they saw the danger and recommended that the League of Nations take a strong stand, pledging our support. There were many factors in its failure to do so; but I cannot really blame the League for not coming along. We were not a member. Other countries did not know whether this country would stand behind Hoover and Stimson or would repudiate them as it had Wilson. If the League took action, would we support it? They did not know.

In any case, the free world refused to take strong action against that aggression which tore up all there was to show for World War I: Three pieces of paper and the ideas, moral principles, and commitments behind them—the League of Nations Covenant, the Nine-Power Pact, and the Kellogg-Briand Treaty outlawing war as a means of settling disputes. The western world's default set up the situation which led to World War II in the Pacific and to the destruction of the League. Japan's aggression, unchecked at the start in Manchuria, steadily spread over ever larger portions of the continent.

By 1940 and 1941 President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull reawakened to the fact that it was essential to our security to keep Japan from getting control of the manpower, territory, and resources of China and then of the rest of Asia. So they took a belated stand against Japan's further expansion, which, after we had systematically built her up to the point where she was strong enough to attack us, led of course to Pearl Harbor.

But our Government's return to the principle of maintaining the independence and territorial integrity of China was short lived. As we approached the end of the war in 1945, the desire to get the Soviet Union to join us against Japan and to cooperate with us in forming the United Nations led our leaders to sell out the principles they themselves had declared in the Atlantic Charter. They invited the Soviet Union into Manchuria and gave her control of its major ports and railroads although at Cairo they had promised unequivocally that Manchuria would be returned to China. Thus was set up the situation which has led us in 5 years to the brink of another world war. Even before World War II was ended we had torn up the moral principles for which we had said that the war was being fought.

I shall never forget August 8, 1945. As Mrs. Judd and I at home in Minneapolis were getting ready to go out to a friend's for dinner, the telephone rang and a newspaper reporter told me excitedly that Russia had just declared war against Japan and Secretary Byrnes had issued a statement that the United States had asked Russia to come in as that would shorten the war and save American lives. He asked for my comments.

I was seized with the most intense feeling of dismay I have ever known, a sense almost of internal dissolution. I had come home from China in 1938 and given up my work and my profession to try to report to the American people what I had seen of the Japanese invasion and what I felt sure it would lead to for ourselves, if we did not stop building up Japan's military power. I did not like it, but I was one of the few who had seen first-hand and I was under obligation as an American citizen to report to my people just as a doctor has to report what he finds, however disturbing it may be. If the people would not pay attention, I could not help that, but at least I had to warn them regarding the effects which Japan's aggression in Asia, if successful, would have on our country's security.

At frightful cost, we had now almost defeated Japan's aggression in order to keep China independent and friendly to ourselves. And we were inviting in another potential enemy, Russia, and starting to build it up in Asia. Furthermore our Government officials were endeavoring to justify Russia's violation of its nonaggression pact with Japan, even though we had bitterly condemned Mussolini when he violated his nonaggression pact with France, and Hitler when he did the same with Poland and Russia.

All I could say to the reporter was: "There goes the peace."

He asked, "What do you mean?"

I said, "Well, there goes Manchuria, then China, then Asia, then Europe, and then ourselves—unless somewhere along the line we fight. We will not get real peace."

For without Manchuria, China could not recover, any more than western Europe could recover without the Ruhr and western Germany—a fact which unfortunately it has taken 5 years to discover.

Without China, the countries along her borders from Korea and Japan to India cannot recover or be secure.

Without the resources and markets and trade of those countries—not on the old colonial basis of exploitation, but on the basis of mutual cooperation and development—Europe cannot recover or become secure.

Western Europe has the second best workshop in the world, but a workshop is useless without raw materials; and Europe does not have the raw materials. Industrial capacity and technical proficiency constitute only one of the four main factors of power. Western Europe does not have the other three factors: Raw materials, manpower, and territory—and we cannot supply her out of our resources indefinitely.

There was another consideration which led to my dismay at a time when almost everyone else was cheering. I had long urged that we try to keep Russia out of the Pacific war—including a personal appeal to that effect to President Truman the day before he went to Potsdam. But I had repeatedly stated my belief that in the end Russia would enter the war against Japan because of her understandable desire to have a major hand in the settlements in that area of the world. However, it had not occurred to me that we would be asking Russia to come into a war that I felt sure nothing could keep her out of. So I added to the reporter:

> I am sorry the Russians broke their word with Japan, and I am even sorrier if we urged them to do so. It is short-sighted expediency for us at a time when we are trying to build a new world order based on the sanctity of the pledged word, to ask an ally to violate its pledged word. If it is all right for Russia to break its word in this instance because it is to our advantage, then how can we expect Russia or any other country, to keep the new agreements we are entering into, whenever it becomes advantageous to them not to do so? That is why I say, There goes the peace. We are cynically violating the international morality on which alone a lasting peace can be built.

The next day the paper reported what I had said and some people jumped on me as being unduly distrustful of Russia or even hostile to our ally. But my dismay was not at Russia's action. I had expected that. It was wholly in accord with her leaders' principles—if that is the right word for the rules of conduct they follow. Rather, my dismay was at the immorality of my own country's action.

We cannot condemn the Government of the Soviet Union for betraying values which it does not profess. To the best of my knowledge, it lives completely according to its teachings. But we had made moral commitments of another sort. After this war there was to be no aggrandizement—territorial or other. There were to be no territorial changes that did not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned. Sovereign rights and self-government were to be restored to those who had been deprived of them, and so on. Remember? The world had rallied around that great Atlantic Charter. It thought it was a set of moral principles—so did I—not a propaganda document to persuade peoples to be our allies against one enemy—until we found it expedient to sacrifice them to another.

So, Mr. Chairman, the first finding in the autopsy is that twice in one decade we made the same mistake of imagining that what happened in Europe was more likely to get us into war than what happened in Asia.

There were plenty of warnings, but few people heeded. On March 15, 1945, when it was clear that we were going to win World War II, I myself tried to warn as best I could against such a mistake, in a speech I made here, the opening sentence of which was:

> We got into this war through Asia, and if America gets into another war, almost certainly it will also be through Asia.

This must have been read by many because the speech was reprinted in Time magazine and Reader's Digest. Yet I suppose that few believed it really could happen.

I wish so much that I had been wrong. It is no satisfaction or even consolation to a doctor to have his diagnosis proved right when the one who is going to die is his own loved one—or the youth of his own country.

The second finding is that in both wars we ourselves helped bring on the trouble by putting expediency ahead of principle. In the thirties we helped the aggressor, Japan, instead of the victim, China. It was good business and it appeased Japan—for a time.

In the forties we bribed Russia by giving her China's territory and then appeased communism in China while denouncing those who were resisting it.

In Europe we insisted that in order to get our help the governments must keep the Communists out; but in China we insisted that in order to get our help the Government must take the Communists in.

Mr. Chairman, we have used the Chinese as pawns and the Koreans as pawns, first, in our attempts to buy Russian cooperation and then in our power struggle with the Soviets. The chickens are coming home to roost in Korea—as was inevitable. The unforgivable tragedy is that, as always, innocent young men have to pay in blood for the mistakes in character and brains of those in charge of their Government.

I do not say this for political reasons. I, too, am a part of this Government. I say it more like the publican who smote his breast and said, "Lord, be merciful to me a sinner."

We have had enough of the supercilious Pharisees, saying: "Thank God, we are not like those backward peoples in Asia, so inept, incompetent, inefficient." We are seeing in Korea what those peoples can do when they have the training and the weapons. Our men, fighting both with them and against them, have quit making light of their capacities. We, too, had better begin to recognize the potentialities in Asia.

For, Mr. Chairman, I have always believed that World War II will eventually be recognized as primarily a war to determine who is to control or whose ideas are to guide the development of the peoples and resources of Asia.

Hitler understood that. He said one time that if Germany had all of Europe that would not solve Germany's problems. Of course not; there are no sizeable undeveloped areas in Europe. He tried to get Europe merely to have a base or springboard from which to move to control of the undeveloped areas of the world. They are in South America, Africa, and Asia. South America and Africa have great natural resources, but they do not have adequate manpower. Only Asia has great undeveloped natural resources and great undeveloped human resources. More than half the people of the world live in Asia. Which way are they to go? That is likely to be the decisive question of this century.

Japan knew it. That was why she worked so hard and so long and sacrificed so much trying to get control of the manpower and resources of China and then of Asia.

Russia knew it. In 1923 Lenin wrote, "In the last analysis, the outcome of the world struggle will be determined by the fact that Russia, India, and China, and so forth, constitute the overwhelming majority of the population of the globe."

At the end of the last war the Soviets had about 200,000,000 people under their control. Now, with their satellites in Europe, and what they have seized in Asia, they have almost 800,000,000. We of the free western world, are almost 800,000,000 people. The two roughly balance. Who determines which way the balance is to tip? The remaining 700,000,000, of course. And where do they live? On the periphery of China—from Korea to Iran. They are the spokes of the wheel of which China is the hub. That is why China has always been and still is the crucial area.

Russia did not forget that fact even if we did. Here is a photostat copy of a page from the Daily Worker of September 7, 1937. It reproduces three letters written to Earl Browder, then head of the Communist Party in the United States of America. One was from Mao Tse-tung, who signed himself as President of the Chinese Soviet Republic; one from Chu Teh, leader of the Chinese Red Army, and one from Chow En-lai, now Prime Minister of the Communist regime in China. These men had written to him shortly after the outbreak of the Japanese all-out war against China in 1937. They were appealing for help from their Communist brethren here.

Chow En-lai began his letter to Browder:

> Comrade, do you still remember the Chinese comrades who worked with you in China 10 years ago?

Now, what had Earl Browder been doing in China in 1927? Well, he was there with other leaders of the Communist hierarchy from all the world to help the Reds seize complete control of China as the Bolsheviks had done in Russia in the October revolution just 10 years before. Chiang Kai-shek in China was scheduled to be what Kerensky had been in Russia—an interim leader to be overthrown by the Reds as soon as he had defeated the warlords in southern and central China.

The original Kuomintang, under Sun Yat-sen, had liberated China from the Manchu emperors in 1911, but the sudden transition to a republic had proved too difficult and the regime had disintegrated. Chiang led a reform movement, revitalized the Kuomintang, accepted a coalition with the Communists, and was unifying China. When his forces reached Nanking and Shanghai in March 1927, the Communist units in his armies staged bloody coups. But Chiang was able to put them down.

Kerensky had not been strong enough to keep the Bolsheviks from seizing control of the young Russian Republic in 1917. Benes and Masaryk were not strong enough to prevent the Communists taking over Czechoslovakia in 1948. But Chiang was strong enough to block their "October revolution" in China in 1927 despite the expert assistance the Communists had from Browder and a lot of Russian advisers on the spot, posing as friends. Chiang expelled them. The Russians and the master minds like Browder returned to their homelands, and the Kremlin licked its wounds while preparing relentlessly to avenge them.

If the Communists had succeeded in their plans to overthrow the young Chinese Government and make China a second Russia, it would have advanced their program of world conquest by at least a decade. Fortunately Chiang defeated them in the only serious set-back they ever had until Tito defected and our aid beginning in 1947 saved Greece, Italy, and France. Naturally they have hated Chiang as fiercely as any man in history has ever been hated, and smeared and reviled him accordingly, seeking always to weaken and discredit him and the Chinese Government until they could take over China, the hub of the Asia wheel.

Mr. Chairman, it will be incomprehensible to historians why some in the American State Department should also have made it a major project for the last 7 years to discredit and destroy the one man who more than all others bought us many years of time in this fight to the death with an enemy which he knew and has warned all along was our enemy as much as China's. But that is another story.

Apparently Browder in 1937 was still an agent for communications between the Chinese Reds and the Kremlin. For Chow En-lai continues in this letter to Browder:

> In China at the present time, the concrete process of bringing about the united front and the content of the united front is very devious and complicated. As to what actually happened and what is the present status of the negotiations, I have already transmitted this to you.
> I fervently hope that you and the party under your leadership will give us more support. I am also anxious to get your opinion on our united-front work.

Doubtless he received it, for the American Reds have certainly been skillful in forming united fronts to deceive and use the gullible.

Now may I read also one sentence from the 1937 letter to Browder by Mao Tse-tung, now president of the Communist regime in Peking:

> We feel that when we achieve victory, this victory will be of considerable help to the struggle of the American people for liberation.

You see, after they have conquered and subdued China, then they will be in a position to help "liberate" us too from the capitalist tyranny under which we are supposed to be suffering.

They understood correctly what our Government refused to see, that Communist victory in China would gravely weaken our position in the world, would make us vulnerable to attacks like that now going on in Korea, would increase the burdens and drains on our strength, would tip the scales against us.

There it was, 13 years ago—all written out for any who would bother to read. Hitler too took the trouble, inasmuch as he had to sit in jail anyway, to write it all down so that everybody would be sure to know long ahead of time. We wouldn't pay attention; but that was our tragic error, not his.

Now, if you do not want to go back so far, may I take you to the Daily Worker for December 2, 1945. Here are the official instructions given by William Z. Foster, the head of the Communist Party in this country, to the national committee of the party at its meeting on November 18, 1945, shortly after VJ-day. How can we be sure that these are the Kremlin's orders to the Communist Party in this country? Because had Foster deviated by one iota from what the Kremlin wanted him to say, there would have happened to him what had just happened to Earl Browder for getting slightly off the Moscow beam—he would have been liquidated as leader. Instead Foster is still in good standing.

Let me read. Remember this is the Kremlin speaking:

> On the international scale, the key task, as emphasized in Comrade Dennis' report, is to stop American intervention in China—

Which is Communist lingo for "stop American assistance to China." Assistance to an ally grappling with a rebellion cannot rightly be called intervention.

Now, why should the Soviets think that the most important thing for American Communists to do right after the defeat of Japan, was to get American assistance to China stopped? Because they knew, as everyone else should have known, that without the right kind of outside assistance the Chinese Government could not possibly recover. It had been through too much stress and strain, beginning in 1937 before it had had a chance to become strong. It had had to struggle with too much poverty, too much illiteracy, too much provincialism, too much traditionalism, too long a Japanese war, too much Communist sabotage and rebellion, too much inflation, too much hunger and disease, too many millions of displaced persons, along with too few trained civil servants and administrators, too few who understood that nationalism means putting country ahead of family—a brand new idea in China—and so on and on.

General Marshall said the other day before our committee that we must be patient and generous with the European countries because it took our South 50 years to recover from 4 years of war. But China had been engaged in war with Japan for over 8 years, and internal struggle with Communists for 20 years. China could not possibly recover without patient and generous assistance of the right sort from us—any more than Greece could or Italy could or France could. Even Britain would have gone down if we had not come to her aid with enormous quantities of money and material, in comparison with which China's needs were small indeed.

So if by constantly repeating the theme song that the Chinese Government was feudalistic, dictatorial, reactionary, inept, incompetent, inefficient, undemocratic, corrupt, and all the other derogatory words—if by playing up all the weaknesses in China and never mentioning any strengths or China's vital importance to ourselves, the Communists and their stooges, both inside our Government and among the writers, lecturers, commentators, professors, and so forth, could divert our attention from our own national interests and persuade us to withdraw from China and stop effective assistance to her weakened government, they knew that its power to resist would be worn down and China at last be taken over. Russia would then have the giant hub of the Asia wheel and be able to move out into any of the surrounding spokes when and as she wished. What other task, I ask you, could be so important to the Kremlin's plan for conquest of Asia, then of Europe and then of ourselves as beguiling America into stopping effective assistance to China?

Foster summed it up in this sentence:

> The war in China is the key of all problems on the international front—

Not Japan, not Germany, not the Mediterranean, not the Balkans, not the oil of the Middle East, not the North Atlantic or any of the other areas where we have focused our efforts—but China. The Kremlin 5 years ago instructed its followers that the war in China is the key of all—I repeat, all—problems on the international front. While we were seeking to forget China and its troublesome war against Communists, the Kremlin was already working to win that war and the crucial victory which that would represent in its never-ending warfare against us and all the free world.

How was the party to carry out the task assigned to it? Let me quote further:

> On the question of China, which is our key concentration, * * * we want to hold 500 meetings all over the country to mobilize all the forces of the people that we can reach to put a stop to the intervention in China. Our party must use every ounce of its strength and skill and organizational ability to make these 500 meetings a success.
> These struggles will be a supreme test of the ability of our party to function effectively in such a complicated and difficult situation as we now confront. We must keep clearly in mind that if we concentrate on these two key problems of the wage movement and American intervention in China as the most burning and urgent of all the tasks confronting us, this does not mean that we can neglect the many other vital problems I have mentioned. * * *
>
> For example, would it not be a big mistake to neglect the fight over the atom bomb? On the contrary, we must find the ways and means to participate to a much greater extent than we are now doing precisely in the mobilization of the people over this vital issue. * * * We must while concentrating on these two key questions of domestic and foreign policy—the wage movement and intervention in China—learn how to link up all the other struggles we are carrying on.
> Never in all its history was our party called upon to use such generalship. * * * It must find more and more effective ways to ally itself with the broader masses of the people and to set these masses in motion. This is a supreme test of the maturity of our party.

I wish I had time to read also the report to the same meeting in 1945 by Comrade Gene Dennis, secretary of the party, now in jail for contempt of Congress. He, too, demanded withdrawal of American troops and supplies from China, hammering on the slogans of the "reactionary Kuomintang dictatorship" and the "proved patriots of China"—meaning, of course, the same Reds who have now made China a colony of the Soviet Union. Also in his report you will find many phrases which soon appeared in the speeches of innocents like Henry Wallace, and reappear in the phony peace petitions and propaganda being promoted so vigorously just now by the Communists and their unconscious dupes.

Let me show you one illustration of how rapidly the Kremlin's instructions to "get resolutions of protest adopted" produced results. The instructions were transmitted by Foster to the national committee on November 18, 1945. In the same issue of the Daily Worker in which they were published only 2 weeks later, the lead story occupying two-thirds of the front page is headlined: "Protests forcing show-down on intervention in China—Representative DeLacy speaks up for aroused Nation."

The story begins:

> The American people have only just begun to speak up against the Truman administration's military intervention in China and its atomic diplomacy throughout the world.
>
> On behalf of himself and five other west coast Congressman, Representatives John Coffee and Charles Savage, of Washington, and Helen Gahagan Douglas, Ellis Patterson, and Ned Healy, of California, DeLacy submitted a resolution demanding the immediate withdrawal of all American troops and military equipment in China.
> DeLacy * * * pointed to the democratic character of the great mass movement led by the Chinese Communists and to the dictatorial character of the Kuomintang clique led by Chiang Kai-shek.

The text of the resolution is printed in full and, of course, is couched in the same party line double-talk about peace, unity, democracy, and so on.

DeLacy did not mention that to withdraw assistance and support from the Chinese Government before it had a chance to restore order in the country, would be decisive intervention in favor of the Communists. American withdrawal looked like peace; but led, of course, to war—in China then just as later in Korea. That was what it was designed to do. It threw away that which 108,000 Americans had just died in the Pacific to win. It gave China to Russia, and China, I repeat, is the hub of the Asia wheel.

Once their key task had been explained to American Communists, they had their faithful followers and those whom the faithful could influence or use, doing the job effectively within 2 weeks. Do you wonder why as a result of the skillful drive to induce us to abandon China to the Red armies, we are fighting some of the same Red forces only 5 years later in Korea, fighting because we now see that it is that or lose the rest of Asia too?

So the third finding in the autopsy is that the Kremlin has been vastly smarter than our Government in understanding where the real keys to world power are and more effective in extending its conquests than we have been in advancing the cause of freedom and our own security.

Is it surprising that the Kremlin was so successful in putting across its gigantic hoax about Chinese communism when there were eminent American officials including Members of Congress who, however unknowingly, allowed at least their names to be used to further its purposes?

The Chinese Communists did not need to drive us out of China. The Moscow directors of the world conspiracy and their agents and dupes inveigled us into leaving voluntarily.

Let me pursue further the question of why the loss of China to Communist control is the key to present events in the Far East. It is due in large part to China's central geographical position in Asia. State Department spokesmen for years have talked almost casually of writing off China and then building up the countries around her. But if you let the hub of a wheel be chopped out, how can you hold together or make anything useful out of the individual spokes?

Or, to change the figure: China is like a giant hand and the surrounding countries like the outstretched fingers. God made them that way and we have to deal with the situation that exists, whether we like it or not. Here is the hand, mainland China, and here are the fingers—11 of them: Korea, Japan, Formosa, the Philippines, Indonesia, Indochina, Siam, Malaya, Burma, India, Pakistan, almost to Iran. These fingers are where the 700,000,000 people live who can tip, one way or the other, the balance of power that exists today between the Soviet world and the free world. These people are still on the fence. Which way are they to go—with us or with the Soviets? All the other problems on the international front do indeed depend on that. And what happens in the fingers depends largely on what happens in the hand, China.

Some who were charged with our protection have argued that it did not make much difference to us what happened in China, apparently because they did not happen to like certain leaders in China or what those leaders were doing as they struggled with their gigantic problems. So instead of pitching in to help the Chinese with their otherwise insurmountable difficulties, our experts sat up in the bleachers and gave them moral lectures. We maintained our pose of pious propriety, but the Commies won the victories.

Communist forces have now moved out into the Korea fingertip and we find ourselves fighting desperately to hold that tip. But if we push them back to the thirty-eighth parallel or even back to Manchuria, they can move right into that same finger again, as soon as our attention is turned elsewhere, or into other fingers, Indochina, Burma, or the Philippines; or into two or three at the same time. They can bleed us to death in the figers all around the periphery of the hand which is China, here in the center.

Plenty of people besides the Communists have long understood this. I was in the Far East in October and November of 1947 and on my return I made this report on November 14, 1947, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. In addition to appearing in the hearings I inserted it in the Appendix of the RECORD in order to make reprints and distribute them as widely as I could. In it and in many talks over the country I reported what General MacArthur had said to me in a long interview he graciously granted me. I did not identify him by name at the time; I merely referred to him as a great American out in the Far East.

He said he was no longer anxious about Japan as such. What worried him was the situation in China. He put it this way:

> Our failure at the end of the war to help the Government of China effectively with its otherwise insuperable problems particularly the Communist rebellion, will turn out, I fear, to be the single greatest blunder in the history of the United States. For the first time in our relations with Asia, we confused the paramount strategic interests of the United States with an internal purification problem in China.

He was concerned because he knew that Japan could hardly recover without China. Why? Because the Japanese have to eat. They cannot raise enough to feed themselves. They have got to get food and many raw materials from outside. We put $856,000,000 into Japan last year alone—about half of it for food and materials. We cannot do that indefinitely. But they must get food and raw materials from somewhere. If they are to pay their own way they must use raw materials to manufacture products to sell to the billion people on the Asia Continent in order to get more raw materials and food supplies for themselves. If the Communists have China and get more and more of these other fingers around China, and the day comes when we cannot longer hold the Japanese up economically or continue to defend them with our troops, then the Communists do not need to invade Japan. The Japanese themselves will have to knock at the Red door and beg, "Please let us in behind the Iron Curtain, too. We have to eat."

When General MacArthur gave me some of his views on the whole area, and they were so different from what I had heard from our Government here about the supposed unimportance to us of Communist expansion in China, I said to him in perplexity, "Is it possible that our Government has sent you to do a job in Japan and has not consulted you as to what you think is necessary on the continent in order to enable you to succeed in Japan?"

To which he replied, "That, of course, I cannot answer." He did not need to. I had the answer. Do you wonder why he has been eating his heart out in Japan as he saw America's position in the Far East steadily deteriorating from its all-time high on VJ-day to its recent all-time low?

A few months later, when our committee was holding hearings on the ECA program and considering aid to China, I urged it to send a cable to General MacArthur to ask him to come and testify in person; or, if that were not possible, to send his views on American policy in the extension of aid to China. Let me read two paragraphs of the cable he sent to the committee on March 3, 1948. Every word deserved most careful study, yet it was scarcely mentioned in the press. It did not fit the "line" that was being promulgated so skillfully about China. Here are his words:

> I can say without the slightest hesitation that a free, independent, peaceful, and friendly China is of profound importance to the peace of the world and to the position of the United States. It is the fundamental keystone to the Pacific arch. Underlying all issues in China is now the military problem. Until it is resolved little progress can be expected toward internal rehabilitation, regardless of the extent of outside aid. Once it is resolved, however, there is little doubt but that China's traditional resiliency will provide the basis for rapid recovery to relative stability.

Please listen to this:

> The Chinese problem is part of a global situation which should be considered in its entirety in the orientation of American policy. Fragmentary decisions in disconnected sectors of the world will not bring an integrated solution. The problem insofar as the United States is concerned is an over-all one and can only be resolved on the broadest possible global basis. It would be utterly fallacious to underrate either China's needs or her importance. For if we embark upon a general policy to bulwark the frontiers of freedom against the assaults of political despotism, one major frontier is no less important than another, and a decisive breach of any will inevitably threaten to engulf all.

That was an inspired statement in its accurate understanding and analysis of the whole picture. One of the personal tragedies of the present Korean invasion is that General MacArthur is now called upon to retrieve an almost impossible situation in which we would never have been if his counsel and advice had been sought and heeded.

Instead, you will recall that right after the Japanese surrender he was officially lectured and put in his place by Mr. Dean Acheson, who was then Under Secretary of State. General MacArthur was on the spot and he outlined policies for the occupation of Japan. The leftists and those who always know how to reform others objected to it as soft. The State Department announced that—> its decision for social and economic revolution in Japan would be carried out.

MacArthur went ahead with his judgment that—> by utilizing the Japanese Government structure to the extent necessary to prevent complete social disintegration, insure internal distribution, maintain labor, and prevent calamitous disease or wholesale starvation, the purposes of the surrender terms can be accomplished with only a small fraction of the men, time, and money originally projected.

But that was not the policy that was desired by the State Department "experts," as was proved by the secret statement of policy—the notorious FEC–230—which they prepared. Under it General MacArthur, as the representative of a capitalist economy in the United States was to produce a socialist economy in Japan, with as much dislocation as possible. They had sent over Mr. George Atcheson to be MacArthur's political adviser, and manage the social and economic revolution. I am glad to report that he had a conversion from his leftist views before he was killed in a plane crash. On his staff were men like John K. Emerson and John Service from the Far Eastern Office of the State Department. At the same time, another man Mr. John Carter Vincent, who frankly told me that for 3 years he tried his best to get the Communists into the Chinese Government, was made Director of that Office. Altogether they were set to transform Japan into a nice little streamlined socialist "democracy" overnight.

Under Secretary Dean Acheson publicly spanked General MacArthur for having different policies. He seemed to be especially provoked because the latter's policies were succeeding so well that MacArthur predicted on September 17, 1945, that the occupation army could probably be cut to 200,000 in 6 months. In Acheson's statement of rebuke made on September 19, 1945, he said:

> The occupation forces are the instruments of policy and not the determinants of policy.

According to the New York Times, MacArthur said:

> It is extraordinarily difficult for me at times to exercise that degree of patience which is unquestionably demanded if the long-time policies which have been decreed are to be successfully accomplished without repercussions which would be detrimental to the well-being of the world, but I am restraining myself to the best of my ability and am generally satisfied with the progress being made.

Fortunately General MacArthur's position prevailed because his prestige with the American people was such that they stood by him rather than the State Department. How tragic that he was not in charge of our affairs in China as well as in Japan.

Now, coming to Korea, one of the fingers projecting out from the China hand. I reported when I came back from Asia in November 1947 that the Communists would get China unless we changed our negative policies, and if they got China they would get Korea too. I did not like it, but it seemed to me clearly inevitable, so I had to report it. I told of a long conversation I had with a great Korean patriot, Mr. Kim Koo. He had been head of the Korean Provisional Government, in exile in China, where it had been organized to carry on agitation and underground activities against Japanese rule of Korea. The Chinese had been wise enough to give it asylum until it was able to go back to Korea after the surrender in 1945. Mr. Kim has since been assassinated. I talked to him in Korea one evening, and the following is from my report:

I said to him, "What should America do now? We have delayed 2 years hoping we could get agreement with the Russians that would reunite Korea, but cooperation with them hasn't worked here any better than anywhere else. Should we delay longer, waiting for the UN Commission to see what it can do? Should we go ahead in South Korea anyway, hold elections, set up a defense force, and try to get the country on its feet and withdraw our forces? Or what?"

He studied a minute and then said, "It doesn't make any difference what you do now. There isn't any way to get Korea so that she can be independent and secure and self-sustaining, until you solve the Communist problem across the border in Manchuria."

I asked various other questions, to all of which he replied in substance, "There is no way you can solve the problem so that we can be independent and secure until you help China remove the Communist menace in Manchuria."

He knows that if Russia controls Manchuria, the Communists, when we leave Korea, will take it over too.

Our Government ought to have known it also. Or if it did know it, then it had no business to be so complacent and inactive about Manchuria, which at that time had not yet fallen to the Communists.

Our boys now have to go over to Korea to fight and die in an effort to save something out of the smashup there which inevitably followed our refusal to pay attention to the wisdom and foresight of the many men who did understand the problems of Asia as thoroughly as the autopsy makes clear that the State Department policy-makers in recent years did not understand them.

Mr. Chairman, I urge our Government to call back into emergency service statesmen like Grew, Hornbeck, Dooman, Berle, and others—men who are real experts on Asia or on communism, men whom the left wing boys pushed out of the Department. You will recall that Alger Hiss was a key man in the Far Eastern Office from 1939 to 1944 when the pattern of building up the Chinese Communists and building down the Chinese Government was established.

The genuine experts had long warned about the miscalculations regarding Asia which were leading to the crisis of today. We need them now. We need every bit of brains and ability and experience and understanding of so complicated and dangerous a situation, that the country can muster; for, as MacArthur warned would be the case, the breach of the Asia front already threatens to engulf all.

It was considerations like the above which caused me to say when the committee hearings on the bill for Korean economic aid were opened June 8, 1949:

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, not since I have been in Congress have I been faced with a more difficult decision than this bill presents. I have worked for Korean independence all these many years since I lived in the Far East. I have a great affection and regard for them as a people and confidence in their capacity to govern themselves well, if they have security and wise help and encouragement for a while.

Yet, I can see no possible justification for setting up democratic governments in Korea and the Philippines and then allowing the continent to be taken over by the Communists, which in my opinion will make it impossible for those democratic governments to survive. I do not know an informed citizen of any country in Asia who thinks these marginal countries can long stand if all China is taken over by the Communists.

If China is free, Korea and Japan have a good future. If not, then no matter how much we pour in, they cannot become self-sufficient and secure.

China can get along without them but they cannot get along without her. Everybody in Asia knows that.

* * * * *

To me Korea is merely the first of the rat holes that we will have to pour money into all around China if we do not plug up the basic rat hole in China.

Two years ago we reversed our policies with respect to Europe. We recognized we could not get recovery or security piecemeal. We took an over-all approach which made sense and we of this committee fought to get it through and it was a wise piece of legislation.

If we will make a similar reversal of policy in Asia, see the area as a whole, of which the Korea program is merely a part, then this can be justified because it too makes sense.

But a fragmentary approach, trying to sustain some countries while allowing others to go down is, I fear, doomed to failure.

Despite the refusal of the administration to support the sort of program which I thought was necessary if it were to have much chance of success in either Korea or Asia, I decided to go along and, as you know, spoke and voted for the Korean economic aid bill when the leadership finally brought it before the House on January 19, 1950—7 months later.

During that debate I said, as the original transcript shows:

I am willing to predict, although I shall take this remark out of the RECORD, that it (Korea) will be overrun and our money will probably be lost.

Then I added—and this appears in the printed RECORD (p. 651):

But despite those reasons, and despite my fear that as a result of our actions at Yalta and our inaction in China, the odds are against this young republic and the difficulties we have helped to pile up for it may prove beyond its strength, still I am in favor of passing this bill because the reasons for it outweigh those against it. It provides the only hope Korea has.

Unfortunately our fears have become sad facts.

That brings me to the place in the autopsy where we must report eight or so of the specific mistakes that have led to this Korean tragedy. In not a single one is it hindsight either, because the bad results were foreseen and warned against by many people—long before the autopsy.

The first mistake was at Yalta. Mr. Acheson said to a group of us one day, in attempting to justify our granting to Russia rights in Manchuria which did not belong to us and without the consent or even the knowledge of the Chinese to whom they did belong and to whom we had solemnly and publicly promised at Cairo that they would be returned:

Our concern was to get Russia into the war against Japan in order to shorten it and save American lives. I myself had a son on a destroyer out in the Pacific.

Now that is certainly a laudable objective—to save American lives immediately. But is it the only concern, or can it be the decisive consideration? What will it do to the hopes of enduring peace, which is the way to save the greatest number of lives? What will it do to the lives of people in countries that are our allies, like China, Korea, the Philippines? And to the lives of the Americans who have to go out later to try to undo the damage done by the decision?

Mr. Chairman, Wendell Willkie told the whole truth on this difficult problem when he said early in the last war, "Every drop of blood saved through expediency will be paid for by twenty drawn by the sword."

Perhaps some American lives were saved by the Yalta deal. And, if I had been fighting out there then, I realize that probably I would also have been praying that the Russians would enter the war to save me from having to land on a Japanese beachhead. But the fact remains that for every life saved by Yalta scores of Americans and thousands of Koreans are dying there today.

Mr. Chairman, there is no way a nation can sell out its moral principles and escape the day of judgment. There is no way we can build a world order that will be just and peaceful without international morality, and we cannot get international morality by breaking commitments. It was wrong when Hitler did it; it was wrong when Japan did it; it was wrong when the Kremlin did it; it was wrong when we did it. Most of our troubles today, in Korea and elsewhere, flow right from the expediencies of Yalta. Mr. Roosevelt was very, very sick, and I do not want to speak of him in the least uncharitably. Doubtless he was trying desperately to get our relations with Russia on a firm basis. But that cannot be purchased with other peoples' rights and territory.

Lest anyone dislike to take my views on this, let me quote the findings of two devoted Democrats.

In his book entitled "Where Are We Heading?" Sumner Welles has written of the Yalta agreement to restore to Russia the rights formerly possessed by the Imperial Russian Government to dominate Manchuria through the control of the Chinese Eastern and South Manchurian railroads and the port of Dairen and the naval base at Port Arthur:

These concessions, which will make it altogether impossible for a new, unified China to exercise full sovereignty within Manchuria, are all the more objectionable in view of China's absence from the conference table when they were decided.

Robert Sherwood cites this quotation in his book "Roosevelt and Hopkins" and adds this comment:

Such criticism from Welles can hardly be dismissed as coming from one who did not know what he was talking about or who was embittered by hatred of Roosevelt.

* * * * *

Stalin insisted that these agreements must be put in writing and must contain the statement: "The heads of the three Great Powers have agreed that these claims of the Soviet Union shall be unquestionably fulfilled after Japan has been defeated."

This, in my opinion, was the most assailable point in the entire Yalta record * * * for, if China had refused to agree to any of the Soviet claims, presumably the United States and Britain would have been compelled to join in enforcing them.

Again may I say that I report these things not to blame or recriminate, but if possible to prevent our Government's ever again imagining that we can get good faith with one ally by bad faith with another; that we can buy the good behavior or goodwill of the strong by sacrificing the weak; or that might makes right, even if the might be our might. It must be driven home right now that just as the expediencies of Yalta did not end our troubles but multiplied them, so we must not be tempted to try to get out of our present predicament by making another deal at the expense of someone else or of our own principles, no matter how sharp or clever or desirable the scheme may appear.

A second mistake was the decision by military men here in Washington to divide Korea along the thirty-eighth parallel and assign the Russians to accept the Japanese surrender north of that parallel while we were moving our troops in to accept surrender south of the parallel. Despite extended questioning of representatives of various Government agencies, we were not able in the committee to get a full and satisfactory picture of just how and why this was done. There are certain facts, however, which seem to be established:

First. Korea was divided solely on our initiative, without any request or suggestion to that effect from Russia.

Second. It was proposed by the War Department on August 11, 1945, when the Russians did not have a single soldier in North Korea.

Third. It was done here in the Pentagon but we could get no testimony from anyone that it was ever requested or suggested by General MacArthur, although he was commander-in-chief of the whole theater, including Korea.

Fourth. There was no testimony that the State Department or those officials responsible for winning the peace in Asia and making good on our commitment at Cairo that Korea would in due course be given her independence, were consulted; or that any consideration was given by anyone to what the political and economic effects of a division of Korea would be, especially a division at the thirty-eighth parallel.

Fifth. The line chosen was just about the worst possible line that could have been picked. Korea as a whole has a reasonably balanced economy. But division along the thirty-eighth parallel made it impossible for either side to survive without a lot of assistance from the outside. The best agriculture is south of the line; most of the good coal, minerals, water power, and industries are north of it. There are factories on the south side whose power and raw materials come from the north side—or rather did come from the north before we gave it to the Russians.

No one was able to explain why the particular line was picked. Someone suggested that it may have been chosen because it is roughly midway between the two biggest cities in Korea and it thus gave one, Pyongyang, to North Korea and the other, Seoul, to South Korea. Perhaps as good an explanation is that the map at which someone in the Pentagon was looking already had a line running horizontally across it, which the map makers had put on it—as they usually put on maps to indicate latitude.

Sixth. There is no evidence that any division at all was necessary. May I quote from some of the testimony before our committee in June 1949. Because this portion of the hearings was not printed, I shall not identify the authors of any of the statements except my own:

Mr. JUDD. Were the Russians threatening to move into North Korea at the time this ad hoc military decision was made?

General ———. It was almost simultaneously but they had not moved in. However, the intelligence estimate made at the time was that they would move in, that they could, and that they could overrun the peninsula before our forces could get there.

Mr. JUDD. Of course, they could. They could overrun Berlin, too, if they wanted to. Was General MacArthur not commander-in-chief of the whole theater?

General ———. Yes; he was.

Mr. JUDD. * * * Why could the line not have been set at the Korean border? What reasons were there to believe that the Russians would not stop at the Korean border if the commander-in-chief set the line there?

General ———. I cannot say what other offers were made, if any, as to a border further north, but my information is that it was offered to the Soviets in the plan that was made as being one they would accept rather than something further south.

Mr. JUDD. We cannot have it both ways. If the Soviets were insisting on moving into Korea, then we should have been alerted at that time to the fact that they did not intend to cooperate with us in the peace * * * and governed ourselves accordingly.

If they did not insist on moving in, then the only other conclusion is that we invited them in, completely unnecessarily. That is one reason I feel we must pass some sort of bill for Korea, because I think we ourselves created the mess. How can we blame the Koreans for the bad results of a situation which is the result of our decision? The Koreans did not have anything to do with it, that is sure.

Seventh. We were not able to find out from anyone whether Korea was discussed at Yalta. It was stated that General Marshall and his staff there consulted with Russian military men to work out coordination between Russian forces and our forces in the expected attack upon Japanese troops in Manchuria. We could get no information either way as to whether there was an understanding that Russia intended to enter Korea, and if so, whether there was discussion or agreement on coordinating her campaign and our campaign into Korea.

Mr. JUDD. It is a question that is bound to be asked until it is cleared up. If it was discussed at Yalta how we were going to meet and handle our joint operations not only in Manchuria, but also in Korea, then our Government had months to make some political plans as far as Korea was concerned. * * * If it was not discussed and no agreement was reached at Yalta, then you faced a different situation. Too often you men in the military do brilliant jobs winning a war * * * and then because we have not thought ahead—all of us are to blame for it—how we are going to hold on to the fruits of victory, it slips through our fingers.

Korea is a tragic example of our failure, while still fighting, to think beyond the military objectives to the political objectives for which the war was being fought, supposedly. Just off-hand, without preparation, without forethought or planning by our political experts, our military decided to divide Korea, naively supposing it would be temporary; and picked the thirty-eighth parallel, which was about the worst possible from the standpoint of Korea.

A third mistake was the use of the term "trusteeship" for the arrangement worked out at Moscow in December 1945 by the Foreign Ministers of the United States, Russia, and the United Kingdom (China was later included) for ruling Korea while a joint United States-U. S. S. R. Commission was supposed to form a Korean provisional government. When word got to Korea that such a proposal was being considered, the effect upon Korean public opinion was so inflammatory that General Hodge, in command of the occupation, cabled twice urging that the word "trusteeship" not be used. The English word "trusteeship" is translated into the same Korean term as the word which the Japanese used when they established in 1905 a so-called protectorate over Korea. The Koreans remembered vividly that 5 years later the Japanese annexed Korea outright and they were enslaved. Naturally they feared that the same thing would happen to a "trusteeship" established by other great powers, especially one including Russia.

It is certain that the Koreans wanted to be under our military government at first—if it were to be merely a transition stage from being controlled by Japan to real independence. But they did not want to be under us if it were to be merely a transition stage from control by Japan to control by the Soviet Union. Yet the conferees in Moscow went right ahead and ignored the urgent representations of the responsible man on the ground, General Hodge, and announced on December 27, 1945, the establishment of a joint "trusteeship." It all but wrecked Korea's confidence in our integrity and our intentions.

A fourth mistake was that for the first 3 years after VJ-day we refused to train and develop armed forces to defend South Korea, although we knew the Russians were feverishly developing large forces in North Korea, and had large and experienced units made up of Koreans across the border in both Siberia and Manchuria. We were, as usual, perfectly correct and proper—and weak; the Russians made haste to become strong.

The situation, however, was understood clearly by the people of Asia. It was described in the following editorial of September 22, 1948, from a Shanghai newspaper, the China Press, published in English by Chinese trained in and friendly to the United States:

The Soviet's offer to withdraw its troops from Korea by the end of 1948 is timed to synchronize with the opening of a Communist offensive in Asia. What we see in China, Malaya, Burma, and elsewhere are only the opening shots of the campaign—the first step, as it were, on the road to conquest.

That the Soviets are in an advantageous position in Korea appears almost axiomatic. Until a short time ago, the United States followed the terms of the trusteeships to the letter—and to the advantage of the Communists. Instead of training a Korean army the way the Soviets did, the United States prevented and forbade all military training in its occupation zone. Until the United Nations supervised an election and a Korean assembly was elected, all real power was kept out of the hands of Koreans.

The Soviets, on the other hand, began their training of a Korean army almost from the time the troops entered the territory above the thirty-eighth parallel. The Korean Communist Party was given every incentive to organize and build itself up into a future government, while all opposition was ruthlessly wiped out. No wonder the Soviets are willing to withdraw today, knowing that all the trump cards are in the hands of their supporters in Korea.

For the United States, there is now no recourse but to be placed at a diplomatic disadvantage while working for the best interests not only of the Korean people but of all democracies. Unpopular though this course may be, it is the only one providing an opportunity for the people of South Korea to build up their defenses and build up an efficient administration. So long as communism is prevented from seizing all of Korea by force, we are confident that they cannot win the country over by Pyongyang-manufactured "democracy." The only question is: Can the North Korean bear be held off long enough for South Korea to get on its own feet?

It could not. The 3 years lead we presented to North Korea was too great. The North Korean bear has walked in.

One hears people ask, How did the North Korean armies become such fanatical fighters, such skillful warriors? First, because those who are actually North Koreans have been in training for as much as 5 years. Second, no one yet knows how many of them are not North Koreans but Siberian and Manchurian Koreans. A missionary friend wrote me from Korea back in March of 1945, warning what would happen if Russians came into Korea. But our Government dreamed along until the following August and then the military, without advice from the political people, made an ad hoc decision to invite Russia in.

He wrote:

There are 200,000 Koreans living in Siberia and sixty to eighty thousand more are in the Russian Army. If Russians should come into the war before we land troops in Korea, the impact of the Sovietized Koreans, not to mention the Russians, would be tremendous.

He had written about it also to the State Department, but apparently was ignored.

Many of the Koreans in Siberia were fiery patriots who fled Korea years ago to escape Japanese control. The Soviets, thinking always of achieving their world objectives, took them in, trained them, and used them in the last war in their own armies. They are hard, experienced, battle-trained veterans up against our green boys who have been trained for occupation duties more than for combat.

On top of that, there are somewhere between 50,000 and a hundred thousand Manchurian Koreans who have been trained and have fought with the Chinese Communists in Manchuria. They, too, have had battle experience and long indoctrination.

Some ask if the South Koreans can make as good soldiers. Certainly they can, if they are given adequate training and suitable weapons under good leadership. If the Russians can do it, so can we, if we are willing to make the effort. But for years it proved impossible to get our Government to make the necessary effort in either South Korea or China.

It is hard to believe, but our officials told our committee several times that there was more danger of South Korea attacking North Korea than of North Korea attacking the south. So, as we frequently have done, we kept our own side weak. The ones we have been counseled to guard against most in both Korea and China, you know, have been our proved friends, Rhee and Chiang; not the Communists, our enemies. It is fantastic.

The autopsy makes clear that a fifth mistake was the withdrawal of our own troops in June of last year, the same month in which the President sent his message recommending the Korean economic aid program. The last unit was out even before the hearings were completed. I opposed complete withdrawal of our tactical forces as strongly as I could. It was not fair to the young republic. A mother bird does not push her nestling out until it has at least a couple of feathers. We were the ones who had held back Korean military development. It was we who waited 2 years trying to get Russian agreement. It was we who delayed another year for the United Nations to decide upon and then to conduct an election and to get the new Government established. Only then did we allow them to start building even a substantial constabulary.

On November 20, 1948, the new Korean National Assembly passed a resolution urging United States troops to remain in Korea until the security forces of the Republic became capable of maintaining national security. Instead, our Army turned economic aid over to ECA and got out in 7 months. It decided that Korea was not of great strategic advantage to us—and it was not. So it pulled out before they had had a chance to build the strength necessary to hold their own against the northerners known to be backed by the Russians and the Chinese Communists in Manchuria.

The Army gave as its reason that our American troops could not defend South Korea if the Russians were to attack. Of course they could not.

But neither can our troops in Berlin. We have only a few thousand there. The Soviets, with their satellites in east Germany, can seize Berlin over the week end. Why do they not do it? Because of the strength of the American forces there? Of course not. It is because the American flag and a few military units are there as the symbol of American power and determined interest in Berlin. That is why Russia has not moved against Berlin, although she doubtless wants it more than almost anything else as the stepping stone to seizure of Germany.

Members of our committee practically begged representatives of Defense and State to keep American forces in Korea for another year or two—even if only a battalion as the symbol of American power and determined interest in the security of a republic which in so many respects is our own child and that of the United Nations. If the Russians were to make an all-out attack, we would be no worse off than we would be in Berlin—and our presence certainly would be the strongest deterrent to an attack. Contrariwise, military withdrawal was an open invitation to invasion.

Surely the autopsy proves that if Korea is important enough to our overall interests to justify our sending troops back in this June after an attack was well under way, then it could not have been right to pull out last June.

Or, if it was right to pull out last year, how can we justify fighting back in at such cost now?

Then this House refused to support the Lodge-Walter amendment last August—a sixth mistake, in my opinion.

It was a bipartisan amendment offered by two Members who have demonstrated their understanding of the issues in China, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LODGE] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER]. It was offered to the bill establishing the Mutual Defense Assistance program which the bill before us today extends for a year. The amendment provided the administration with authority and funds to give military aid to those resisting Communist aggression in China and in areas around China. If the President and his Cabinet wanted to take the responsibility for not using it, wanted to make no real effort to prevent communism from conquering the remainder of China, Formosa and other endangered areas, then they did not have to do anything. But, as I said here then, I was not willing to be responsible before God and my country and my children for not doing my best to make available to the administration whatever it might need to help all those still free in China and Formosa to resist further enslavement and to keep the advancing Soviet glacier as far from our positions as possible.

The administration would not give us the green light on the amendment, and it was voted down with almost every Republican voting for it and with only a few Democrats following the wise example of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER], a man who knows the score on Communist activities.

Later the Senate put in $75,000,000 for aid to be used in the general area of China, and it became the law. But did the administration use it? Not a cent until recently. The Russians, of course, knew that and naturally interpreted it as meaning that we would not make a real effort to help either Korea or China with military supplies.

That brings us to the biggest error of all—the announcement by the President on last January 5, that we were not going to provide any military aid or advice to Chinese forces on Formosa, those Chinese who have been fighting communism for 23 years—most of the time alone—and who still have the courage and intelligence to fight it—although still alone. The Secretary of State enlarged upon the President's statement in a press conference. He said:

> We are not going to get involved militarily in any way on the island of Formosa.

Whatever else those statements did, they certainly gave public notice to the Kremlin that the door to Formosa was open as far as we were concerned, and they could walk right in.

Then on January 12, 1950, in a speech before the Press Club, the Secretary of State was publicly reported as saying that our security line which we are going to defend runs from the Aleutians through Japan and Okinawa to the Philippines. Since Formosa lies beyond that line, it reaffirmed that we would not be concerned if Formosa were to be seized by the Communists.

Somebody over in the Kremlin apparently said, "We have a map around here somewhere. Let us take a look at it." They found Korea was also beyond our line and therefore would not be defended by us. So they moved in. Why should anyone be surprised?

Parenthetically, the Russians must have been shocked and outraged indeed when the policy announced so positively in January was reversed in June. It is my impression that our return to Korea is the only time we have ever double-crossed the Kremlin. That is treatment we have usually reserved for our friends.

Mr. Chairman, the last great mistake I shall mention was the policy of putting reform ahead of security. Our first preoccupation has been to produce economic recovery and development, based on the thesis that communism wins by propaganda, that people voluntarily choose communism—and especially in countries where people are in poverty. No, it has never yet won a country by propaganda. It has not gained control of a single country on the face of the earth, beginning with Russia, except by force of arms. The really powerful and successful propaganda comes after, not before the conquest.

Some blithely accept the myth that it is by means of their ideas that they seize power. No, the wonderful slogans about all the benefits their regime will supposedly bring win some so-called intellectuals, but in the main propaganda is merely the softening-up weapon, the smoke screen behind which they build up and then use brute force—armed violence. It is after they get control that the real indoctrination that turns people into fanatics begins. They black out every word or idea except what they want people to hear, from the time a baby is nursing at his mother's breasts until he goes to his grave. It is thus that they are able to change men into the fierce fighters with which they intend to conquer the world.

Many kindly but innocent persons in our country have been led to think that if we help people to higher standards of living, that will prevent the spread of Communist imperialism. It is not so. The South Koreans with our assistance had a considerably higher standard of living than the North Koreans. Did that give them protection? No, it reduced their protection because it made them a more desirable target while diverting attention from their first need—security.

Some argue that this is not a war of armaments but a war of ideas and that the better idea and the system which produces most benefits for people will of course win. That is not so either—in the short run. All of history proves that bad ideas supported by arms regularly win over better ideas not supported by arms.

I am completely confident that communism will ultimately fail, because of its own immoralities; but it can and will destroy us and our civilization first—unless we are at least as well organized, determined and strong.

In short, I am not afraid of Communist ideas; I am afraid of Communist arms. Once they overpower you, you do not have any opportunity to do anything with your ideas, no matter how much better they may be.

In his inaugural address, President Truman stated clearly the necessity of securing if there is to be maximum economic improvement. He said that only when countries are "no longer concerned with the problem of national survival" will they be able to work as our partners "to improve the standards of living of all their peoples."

But apparently his State Department did not believe him for it demanded impossible internal reforms as the first condition of our assistance even at a time when in some cases like China, Korea, and the Philippines, their very survival as independent nations was in mortal peril. Both reform and security are necessary and each assists the other. But it is demonstrated that when a nation is threatened by Communists, it must give first priority to its security because only if it remains free is there any hope for democratic reforms. Once taken over by communism there will be no more chance for internal improvement than there is today in Poland or Manchuria.

The chief reason for this military aid bill is that we have found we cannot get the peoples of western Europe to make an all-out effort at economic recovery and reform until they have a greater sense of security. Why should we have expected it of the Koreans? Or the Chinese? I hope we will learn something for ourselves from our mistakes which have led to such tragic experiences for them.

For the Koreans, both north and south, have been the victims not of any bad intentions on our part, but of our ignorance—ignorance of the history of Asia, the geography of Asia, the nature of the Communist world conspiracy and its methods, and the real factors which determine power including both words and weapons.

They have been the victims of expediency on our part—our thinking we could thereby save American lives.

They have been pawns in our struggle with the Kremlin.

These are some of the reasons, Mr. Chairman, why we cannot adopt the suggestion a colleague has just made that we use the atomic bomb against North Korea.

It was we who invited Russia to enter the Pacific war.

It was we who divided Korea.

It was we who withdrew our troops when the Koreans were still almost defenseless.

It was we who announced we would not do anything to defend them because they are beyond a certain line.

How in God's name can we drop the atomic bomb on people who are engaged in this terrible war as the result of decisions that we ourselves made, and on which they were not even consulted? It is hard to say that, but it is true. To save some American lives right now is terribly appealing. But surely we know that it would cost us our moral case, and far more lives, too, in the long run.

It would not save civilization; it would destroy it.

Well, then, in view of all this past history, why take the action we did on June 27 when the President reversed the previous policy and sent troops back into Korea? First, it is not because Korea is valuable as a piece of real estate. Second, it is not because it has strategic value to us. Third, it is not because there can be any possible material or physical gain to ourselves.

We had to do it, when it came to a show-down, Mr. Chairman, because of the moral factors involved and the political objectives at stake. If we had failed to take a stand against this further and particularly bald and unprovoked Communist aggression, then not only Korea but the United Nations would have gone down just as the League of Nations did when it failed to act against aggression. Who in Asia—or Europe for that matter—could put any confidence in us or in the United Nations?

Formosa would go.

The Philippines would go. You will recall that just a year ago its President, Mr. Quirino, warned us here in solemn prophetic words that the time runs short in which we have a chance to define our policy with respect to Communist aggression in Asia, as we did define it in 1947 with respect to Communist aggression in Europe. We have not been willing to pay attention to men from the Orient who knew their own countries and their own Communists.

Indochina would go and soon the rest of southeast Asia. Without access to its materials and markets, Europe could not recover. Certainly we cannot support her indefinitely.

Then Africa and South America would go. They are already honeycombed in large areas.

Then where would we ourselves be?

Mr. Chairman, we had to either resist this aggression in Korea or else prepare to withdraw to the North American Continent. Those were the only choices we had.

The Kremlin embarked long ago on a vast program of world conquest. Never in history has such a military expansion stopped until it was checked. Never can one stop until it is checked.

Therefore, our choice has never been between checking it or not checking it. Our only choice has been between checking it early while still strong ourselves and with strong allies and much of the world on our side; or waiting until we stand alone and then try to check it with just our own strength, and probably lose ourselves and our freedom in the process.

You ask, May this action lead to all-out war? Of course it may lead to war; but not to take it certainly will lead to war, and very possibly to our destruction. Great as are the risks of the decision that has been made, the risks of further indecision would be greater.

As a matter of fact, there are some grounds for encouragement:

First. There is nothing fundamentally worse in the situation than there was before. The disease is only more apparent. It is visible to more people. Since it has been there all the time, that awakening is good, not bad.

Second. Our own mistakes and miscalculations are also more visible. They are being recognized and in some quarters acknowledged. That is the first step toward their correction.

Third. We are arriving at last at a clear diagnosis: Communists in Asia are not likely to be accepted much longer as simple agrarian reformers. Communist movements in Korea, China, and the other countries are seen to be spontaneous peasant uprisings to gain land, peace, bread, liberation, democracy, people's governments, and all the other trick slogans; they are organized aggression, completely subservient to and directed from the Kremlin.

Fourth. We have quit running backward. We are facing forward on our west as we started facing forward on our east 3 years ago. At last we are beginning to grapple with the problem instead of deluding ourselves that it does not exist, or at least is not serious. That gives hope.

Fifth. For the first time the doctrine of containing communism until it breaks from its own inner weaknesses and cruelties has a chance to succeed because, for the first time, we are to try it. I am convinced that the Soviet system, if its expansion is checked, will crack from its own inability to deliver on all the fancy promises it makes. But we cannot check it by holding in Europe and the Middle East and leaving the other end of the barrel—Asia—wide open.

We have never yet put into effect the policy of containment that many have talked about. Unless it is complete containment, then, of course, it is not containment at all. I hope that we intend to contain from now on—while presenting to the confused and discouraged peoples of the world the better alternatives that only genuine independence and security can make possible for them. If we do, I believe that the utter immoralities and viciousness within the Soviet system itself will break it down.

A sixth favorable factor is that in some ways it is better to have the show-down over a case of naked, premeditated aggression against the United Nations-sponsored Republic of Korea, with a government chosen in a supervised election in which 92 percent of the people voted, than to have the issue drawn over Hong Kong or Indochina, for example, or even Japan. Our moral case is stronger because the moral issues in Korea are clear and uncompromised.

A seventh encouraging factor is that presumably we will at last try to develop in Asia programs of mutual effort on the pattern that was worked out successfully in Greece: (1) Moral support to give hope to those who had almost resigned themselves to Communist enslavement. The effects on morale will be dramatic. (2) Military and economic aid including advisers to the key countries, where requested. And we ought to send those who have succeeded in the past and have the will to win, not those who have failed or who are sure nothing much can be done and therefore spend their time explaining why they cannot succeed. (3) Political support. The administration ought to send to the hot spots, such as Formosa, the Philippines, and Indochina, the ablest trouble-shooters we have. Without top-notch political, military, and economic advisers with real authority from our Government, no amount of military and economic aid can be expected to be effective.

Eighth. I hope that the State Department will now exercise some real initiative and leadership toward the Pacific pact that last year's law called for but under which nothing was done. We have reaffirmed the unanimous view of our committee that in Asia, just as in Europe, no one of the nations can stand alone against Soviet might and intrigue. Furthermore, all of them together cannot make it without our full participation and support. It is time to get going in making clear to them that if they are willing to work and work together, the United States stands with them. Although it is very, very late, I am convinced they will make a better effort than the defeatists expect—if they believe, as a result of our new actions and attitudes, that we are becoming mature and dependable.

Ninth. There should be a real chance to strengthen the United Nations so that it can begin to assume more and more of the burdens which we have had to carry because no one else was strong enough to do so. Surely it is clear now that the Soviet Union joined the United Nations not to get peace but to be in a position to further and protect her own aggressions. Surely the lengths to which Russia is willing to go to get Communist China seated in the Security Council make clear how critical she knows that to be to her program of conquest in Asia. If China is to her the key to all problems on the international front, then it cannot be less important to us. To send American boys to die to stop Communist aggression in Korea and then to give Communist aggression in China the prestige and power that seating that regime in the United Nations would bring is unthinkable.

Tenth. One may hope that the naive Titoist myth about Chinese Communists which has befogged so many official minds, will now be recognized as a delusion and abandoned. The line has been, you know, that if we would just help the Chinese Communists succeed, somehow that would make them fail. That was the way the State Department was going to win Mao Tse-tung away from the Kremlin.

But let me read this quote from the speech Mao made at the closing session of the big Communist political conference in Peking just 2 days before the attack on Korea began. The Communists themselves broadcast it to the United States:

> Internationally we must firmly unite with the Soviet Union, the various people's democracies, and all peaceful and democratic forces (this should be read "all Communist forces") throughout the world for our great aim. There cannot be the slightest indecision or wavering on this question.

It always was fantastic to imagine we could convert our enemies into our friends by treating our friends as if they were our enemies. I hope events have ended that phantasy for keeps. If so, it represents the beginning of the long road back to sanity and safety.

Now, one last word. There are only two things that I am afraid of in this whole world situation. One is that we might fail to understand the nature or underestimate the strength, the determination, the wide infiltration, the cruel ruthlessness of the forces of the Kremlin that are against us. Americans dare not kid themselves longer. It would be fatal.

The other is that we might fail to understand the nature or underestimate the size, the strength, the wide distribution, even behind the curtain, of the forces of freedom that are for us. That would be just as deadly a mistake.

If, as a result of this cruel attack upon the free people of Korea, we come to understand at last the full import of communism's crusade for enslavement of the world and rededicate ourselves to the crusade for freedom which has been America's historic mission in the world, then what looks now like total disaster can conceivably bring some ultimate benefit; it can be the beginning of the end for the Kremlin's tyranny. If the Kremlin had not shown its hand so unmistakably in Korea, we might have slumbered on until its strength became so great and the free world so divided and demoralized and weakened that we could not match its power. Then we would have had not only a third world war, but a war that the free world could not win.

Mr. Chairman, from July 4, 1776, to 1931 when Japan invaded Manchuria, the areas of freedom in the world steadily expanded and the areas of slavery contracted. But from 1931 down to the present there has been an alarming expansion of the areas of despotism and slavery in the world and a corresponding contraction of the areas where men can choose their own rulers and determine their own destinies. This trend must be stopped—and reversed—or none of us will be free.

A lot of time has been lost, but thank God we are at last awakening. It is late, but I believe not yet too late. If we will mobilize fully and organize effectively the moral, the material, and the military resources of ourselves and of all free peoples under imaginative, courageous, and inspiring leadership, then the tide of tyranny that threatens everything we count precious can be turned back. Only thus can we secure once more the blessings of liberty for ourselves and our posterity.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON].

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Chairman, the bill now before us to strengthen the Mutual Defense Assistance Act, and broaden its scope, is one of extreme importance in the fateful situation with which our country is now faced.

The bill provides for the authorization of funds necessary to continue military aid not only in the European area but also in the Far East with particular reference to Korea and the serious situation that now exists there.

The bill was unanimously reported to the House after hearings were held. Testimony as to the nature of the problem that confronts our Nation in different parts of the world, and the military necessities, was given by Dean Acheson, Secretary of State; Louis A. Johnson, Secretary of Defense; Gen. Omar N. Bradley, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; W. Averell Harriman, special representative of the United States in Europe; and Gen. George C. Marshall, former Chief of Staff of the United States Army and former Secretary of State. Statements were also received from many members of our diplomatic service serving in many of the troubled spots of the world.

The underlying purpose of the bill is to make effective the findings and declaration of policy adopted by the Congress in 1949. It reads as follows:

FINDINGS AND DECLARATION OF POLICY

The Congress of the United States reaffirms the policy of the United States to achieve international peace and security through the United Nations so that armed force shall not be used except in the common interest. The Congress hereby finds that the efforts of the United States and other countries to promote peace and security in furtherance of the purposes of the Charter of the United Nations require additional measures of support based uopn the principle of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid. These measures include the furnishing of military assistance essential to enable the United States and other nations dedicated to the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter to participate effectively in arrangements for individual and collective self-defense in support of those purposes and principles. In furnishing such military assistance, it remains the policy of the United States to continue to exert maximum efforts to obtain agreements to provide the United Nations with armed forces as contemplated in the Charter and agreements to achieve universal control of weapons of mass destruction and universal regulation and reduction of armaments, including armed forces, under adequate safeguards to protect complying nations against violation and evasion.

The Congress hereby expresses itself as favoring the creation by the free countries and the free peoples of the Far East of a joint organization, consistent with the Charter of the United Nations, to establish a program of self-help and mutual cooperation designed to develop their economic and social well-being, to safeguard basic rights and liberties and to protect their security and independence.

The Congress recognizes that economic recovery is essential to international peace and security and must be given clear priority. The Congress also recognizes that the increased confidence of free peoples in their ability to resist direct or indirect aggression and to maintain internal security will advance such recovery and support political stability.

In view of the changed situation in the Far East, and, particularly because of the events in Korea, the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House has unanimously adopted a motion that—

It is the sense of the committee that the report of this bill contain the statement that the committee favors the negotiation of a Pacific Pact, consistent with the provisions of the United Nations Charter, for the common defense of the Pacific area, and the participation therein of the United States.

The necessity for this bill and the assistance that has and will be given, I think is recognized by all. There is no disputing the fact that the situation is serious and world peace is threatened. The world is being rapidly divided between Russia on one side which is attempting to destroy principles of freedom and enslave nations and people against their will, and on the other side the free peoples of the world, led by the United States, who are determined to maintain principles of freedom, justice, and democracy, as against communism, and resist enslavement to a totalitarian dictatorship.

It has become increasingly clear that if the people of Europe and Asia were to maintain their freedom it would be necessary to do two things. First, strengthen the economic life of the freedom-loving nations that had been devastated as a result of World War II, and, thereby give hope to the crushed and disheartened people of these nations, and, second, assist them in creating defensive strength so they could have some assurance of protection and not be scared into quick surrender and consequent serfdom by a display of power by Russia or any of its satellites. In providing these two forms of aid the United States has had to take a leading part. However, it is not intended that our Nation shall carry the entire burden and consequently a system of cooperation has been developed that calls upon each of the nations assisted to help themselves and to give aid to others to the extent their resources will permit.

We all deeply regret that Russia does not give that assurance of future peace to the world which we would like to see. But, our conscience as a Nation is clear. There has been no desire upon our part for the land of other nations, nor to hold dominion over the people of other nations. As a Nation we have sought and will continue to seek only the acknowledgment and recognition of those principles of justice, freedom, and democracy that will tend to make the peace of the world permanent and secure. The peace of the world is the deepest desire of the heart and soul of America. To the fulfillment of this desire our Nation and its people are dedicated. May God give us the vision and the courage to accomplish that to which we are dedicated.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COUDERT].

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Chairman, I think there has rarely been a more enlightening and inspiring statement from the floor of this House than that just given by the gentleman from Minnesota. I was so interested in it myself, so carried away by it, that I had almost completely forgotten that I was scheduled to follow him.

Mr. Chairman, this is a grave hour for the people of the United States. Americans are dying in the rice paddies of Korea. Thousands more are faced with the same grim prospect as compulsory military service reaches out for them. The Korean fiasco has made it abundantly clear that the very existence of the United States is threatened by a twofold menace: First, the ruthless ambitions of the Kremlin and, secondly, the blundering incompetence of the Truman administration. If the United States is required to make an almost major effort to cope with what the President has so lightly characterized as police action against one of the most insignificant of the Kremlin satellites, how indeed can we expect to meet the menace of Soviet power in more vital areas when we have one hand tied behind our back through the proven incompetence of this administration.

Prior to Sunday night 3 weeks ago, it had been an accepted premise of the Truman foreign policy that Korea was indefensible and was not of vital strategic interest. Our occupation troops had been deliberately withdrawn. Obviously our military plans were made upon the basis that it would not be necessary to defend Korea. And yet in a few hours on a Sunday evening, without consulting Congress or his Cabinet, the President completely reversed the position and ordered American military intervention in Korea. He could not have been right both times, that is, when it was decided to abandon Korea and withdraw American troops and secondly, when that policy was reversed and it was decided to intervene without the military power to do the job successfully. What a grim demonstration of the administration's inability to formulate a consistent foreign policy and sound military strategy.

The whole story is a tragedy of errors for which Americans are paying with their lives and which must greatly weaken our position throughout the world.

The American people are caught in a grim squeeze between the ruthless ambition of the Kremlin and the blundering incompetence of the White House. The United States can survive the Soviet challenge alone. The double threat, however, is a menace to our very existence. We can hardly expect to successmully meet Soviet ambitions and power, shackled by continued incompetence at the top.

The administration, of course, will make impassioned pleas for unity in the face of foreign aggression. There can be no true unity without confidence. The record of the White House over the past years justifies no confidence. On the contrary, it excites only the most lively apprehensions. If the United States were operating under the parliamentary system, there can be no doubt that this administration would now be voted out of office in response to the indignant demand of an outraged people.

In view of the known failures of administration policy, Congress and the American people should completely reappraise their situation and seek to establish a responsible relationship between our foreign commitments and the strength and resources available to maintain them. We are brought face to face with this problem by events in Korea. If there should be further deterioration in that situation, as now seems possible, we shall have to make an immediate decision as to how far we may safely permit the commitment of American military resources in Korea, in the light of our far-flung obligations in Europe and elsewhere throughout the world.

Congress has a very real responsibility in these unhappy circumstances which it cannot duck—the responsibility to protect the American people from further disastrous follies of the administration. The administration must be curbed—its power to blunder must be limited as far as possible. Only an independent-minded and vigilant Congress can do this. It alone can act. Congress must establish a firm curb upon the power of this irresponsible administration. There should perhaps be established a joint committee to sit continuously for the purpose of controlling the administration's actions during this perilous period. There should be appointed to such committee the ablest Members of both Houses, regardless of membership on committees or seniority. This may be a time of life and death for the American people. It is no time to be fooling around with politics.

As to the bill now pending before us, I expect to vote for it for one reason and one reason alone. I have no illusions as to its purely military value. I do not believe that the small amount of weapons and military equipment that may be authorized by this bill will make any decisive difference, in the short term certainly, in the ability of the western European nations to defend themselves if the Kremlin should undertake to move in. As the gentleman from Minnesota remarked a moment ago, the Soviet could take Berlin in a week end, if it wanted to, and presumably that goes for the rest of that fringe of Europe which we are committed to stand by in case of aggression. However, we have a policy the Congress decided upon last year. It is represented by the North Atlantic Pact and the accompanying military agreements. I fear that the moral effect of not continuing this program at this time might well be devastating. I think under the circumstances we have no choice. We must sustain this policy. We must pass this bill and we must go forward with it, hoping, indeed praying, that it may prove effective.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentlewoman from New York [Mrs. ST. GEORGE].

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Chairman, we have heard from the distinguished members of the Foreign Affairs Committee about this bill, and I am sure that even before they spoke no one in this House would oppose it. We all favor it and we favor it for many reasons. First of all, it seems that we must favor it because at this time in our country's history we have finally reached the stage where we need friends, where we cannot stand alone. Secondly, we need it because it is in effect an economy.

I notice on page 57 of the committee report that when General Marshall was asked in the committee what it would cost to arm the United States of America to stand alone and to defend itself against communistic aggression all over the world, he replied that he was not sure but I quote: "I would say something around well over $30,000,000,000 a year." Now the fact, is, Mr. Chairman, that this country is being bled white and that it cannot go on spending at the rate of $30,000,000,000 a year for any cause, however worthy. Lenin said years ago that the way for the United States to be destroyed was for her to bleed herself white. That is the Russian propaganda and the Russian idea, and we are very likely to see it happen if we do not watch out. That is why this measure is a good measure. Because in this measure we are building up our friends, we are giving them strength so that they can stand with us, so that they can also carry their weight in the world. We have come to the point now where we need strong friends, where we have got to give up championing all the weak and feeble people of the world who cannot fight for themselves. No; we want to be with people who think as we do and also who are willing to fight as we are willing to fight.

We hear a great deal these days about the lack of money, the lack of preparedness of our troops and of our Government all over the world. I would like to ask a question right here on the floor of this House. I hold in my hand the figures for the total military expenditures from 1946 through 1949. I would like to point out that, of course, in the fiscal year 1946 these figures represent the last year of the war and are so startlingly high that I have checked and double checked them, as I am always fearful of figures, remembering the words of Dr. Johnson when he said that there are "lies, damn lies, and statistics." But, after checking these figures most carefully I find that since 1946 we have expended in the neighborhood of $80,000,000,000. The breakdown is as follows:

For 1946, for the activities of supporting defense, military defense and naval defense—and I will put all these items separately in the RECORD—$45,065,933,859.

For 1947, Air and Army-Navy, activities supporting defense, $14,280,559,774.

For 1948, $10,923,637,230.

For 1949, $11,913,515,099.

Expenses for 1946

Activities supporting defense	$3,026,676,195
Military defense	25,276,061,313
Naval defense	16,763,196,351
Total	45,065,933,859

Expenses for 1947

Air and Army	$6,293,869,844
Navy	5,557,349,692
Activities supporting defense	2,429,340,238
Total	14,280,559,774

Expenses for 1948

Direction and coordination of defense	$828,227
Air	1,116,798,224
Army	5,247,196,653
Navy	4,197,848,030
Activities supporting defense	360,986,096
Total	10,923,657,230

Expenses for 1949

Direction and coordination of defense	$9,291,369
Air	1,754,222,334
Army	5,237,323,096
Navy	4,377,420,026
Activities supporting defense	535,258,274
Total	11,913,515,099

Now, Mr. Chairman, if we do not have the best Army, Navy, and Air Force in the world, if we do not have the best equipped Army, Navy, and Air Force in the world, it is not the fault of this Congress; it is not the fault of the American taxpayer. It is because someone has blundered; someone in the executive branch of the Government. They have been given the tools; they have been given the money, and I subscribe heartily to the words of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD] when he said, "Bring back the men that knew how to do the job, such as Grew, and others." But I would go one step further, Mr. Chairman, and I would say, "Get rid of the men that do not know how to do the job."

This is a question that the American people want answered. What has happened to this money, what has happened to this treasure, the greatest treasure ever spent by any nation in peacetime on any armament? That question should be answered.

Yes; we will go forward, we will spend more money, and we will spend more blood. We are determined to win. But in justice to those boys who are dying over there, some of whom are dying because they are not properly equipped, we should have this question answered. Above all, we should see that this never happens again. That is our job in this Congress. That, it seems to me, is particularly the job of the women of the Congress. We cannot go out and fight, and for that reason we have all the more responsibility to see that those men who are doing the fighting and the dying are properly equipped.

So I say at this time, there is but one prayer for us, and we should mean it morally and physically, "Lord, give us strength."

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the chairman of the committee or one of his experts one or two questions about this bill as far as it refers to material things.

Section 1 of the bill provides that we shall authorize the President to have $1,000,000,000 for military assistance. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if any member of the council and the defense committees of the North Atlantic Pact organization had requested any part of this $1,000,000,000.

Mr. KEE. All of the pact countries with the exception of two have requested aid. There are two countries that have not requested it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am asking specifically now if the Council and the defense committees created by the North Atlantic Pact, who shall define how these funds shall be used, or any members of those committees, requested these funds officially. That is a very simple question.

Mr. KEE. I would say they have, because that is the only way those funds can be allocated.

Mr. CRAWFORD. This bill states that the President shall be authorized to furnish military assistance. I am going to discuss this bill from the angle of material things. Material assistance in the form of what? "In the form of equipment, materials, and services to such nations as are parties to the treaty and request such assistance." That is the reason I was trying to find out if this assistance had been requested.

Secondly, any such assistance furnished under this title shall be subject to agreements, further referred to in section 402 of the original bill.

These funds are to be used in accordance with the plans by the council and the Defense Committee under article A of the North Atlantic treaty.

And you realize unified direction and effort, and after the agreement by the Government of the United States with the defense plans as recommended by the council and Defense Committee.

Now, I understand these funds must be used in accordance with the plans made by the Council and Defense Committee.

Military assistance however shall be furnished only in accordance therewith.

Here is some strange language which I find in this bill and to save my life, under present conditions, I do not understand why the committee would recommend its enactment. It provides that none of this money shall be used and none of the funds made available for carrying out the provisions of this act to construct or aid in the construction of a factory or any other manufacturing establishment outside of the United States, or to provide equipment for any such factory or other manufacturing establishment.

Here we want the members of the North Atlantic Pact to help us build military equipment and help defend the group and we say that none of the funds shall be used for the purpose of putting them in position to do that very thing. To me that is poor business procedure. I cannot understand it. I am very tempted, if it were permissible under the rules, to move to strike that language out.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. VORYS. The language the gentleman is referring to is partly my product and partly the product of Senator VANDENBERG. There were a number of us who take a dim view of using our funds to build up factories for arms production over there which might be subject to sabotage or capture. On the other hand, the section represents a compromise between our views and those of the mutual defense assistance planners who seek to have military production. The amendment made this year, which includes production equipment as well as machine tools, will make it possible by an expenditure of $70,000,000 to produce somewhere between four and seven times that amount of equipment.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The remarks I made a moment ago were not meant to be as critical as they might have sounded. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS] has explained the situation.

In the original bill I can understand why that language was put in, but I am sorry I was not around when this bill was drafted to help further modify the original language so as to put this in condition for us to go ahead at full steam. So I imagine the gentleman went just as far as he could go, considering the situation.

Now, the gentlewoman from California, [Mrs. DOUGLAS] was discussing a while ago the expanding of our industrial production at this particular time. After having talked with the spokesmen for the five biggest steel companies they tell me that their steel plants are running over 100 percent of rated capacity. They tell me they have on their books at the present time about 120 percent worth of backlog orders for each 100 percent of capacity which they are now producing. So you are not going to get a big expansion of any production of capital goods under these conditions unless the consumers of durable and nondurable consumers goods are willing to eliminate from our consumption budget a sufficient amount of goods to let war material step up very high in production and use the machinery for producing consumer goods to be devoted to the building of war goods.

In wartime you are not supposed to expand your domestic consumption. You are supposed to deny yourself and produce goods for the boys on the battlefields.

I think the hour has arrived when we should do that very thing. I do not know what the President is going to talk about when he comes here tomorrow, but I hope he will recommend restriction in the use of installment credit. In view of the fact that this sort of operation has to do with costs—living costs and industrial costs, I hope the President will also bring into operation on the part of the Commodity Credit Corporation a release of some of these enormous surpluses that we are piling up in the form of cotton, wool, fats, and oils where the ready markets are moving along at the rate of 110 percent or more of parity prices and where we sit and hold those goods in reserve and let the markets skyrocket and the price advance. One woolen manufacturer indicated that he will have to advance the price of woolen goods per yard to the point where a man's suit will be increased in cost by two or three dollars.

The Congress and the American people have been alerted to a message that the White House is expected to deliver on Wednesday noon. It has been hinted that the message will be a complete report on the Korean situation and will be accompanied by President Truman's recommendations for additional legislation necessary to put the country on a degree of war mobilization. It has been further hinted that the message will contain recommendations for a great number of controls including control of prices and rationing.

The White House and the Secretary of Agriculture have recently deplored the rise in commodity prices and have asserted that they were not justified. The prices of cotton, wool, and fats and oils have recently established new highs and are unquestionably the playthings of the speculators. Textiles have recently announced advances because of increased cost of raw materials. One manufacturer has predicted that the recent price rise will increase the cost of a man's suit by two to three dollars.

I am informed that the Commodity Credit Corporation owns and controls approximately 50 percent of the country's cotton stocks—and incidentally, on the basis of the present spot market for cotton it is selling at an estimated 110 percent of parity. The Government also owns large stocks of cottonseed and cottonseed oil, and practically controls these markets. Prices of these commodities have likewise shown sharp increases recently. The Commodity Credit Corporation also owned on May 31, 1950, over 12,000,000 pounds of wool, which is currently also selling far above parity.

If the administration truly wants to hold the lid on prices, I suggest that they utilize the stocks acquired with the taxpayers' money by the Commodity Credit Corporation, offer them to the domestic market at the current market price, and thereby stop further inflationary price rises resulting from the operations of speculators. Where the Government is hoarding large stocks of commodities there exists no valid reason for speculation or wild inflationary price increases. Use of these stocks to stabilize commodities is more to be desired than another OPA and its resulting mass of orders and controls.

To me, those prices have to do with the facilities of the provisions in this bill, wherein we are to provide, as the gentleman from Ohio has pointed out, these material goods. Personally, I think we should further modify this language to let a part of these funds be used to enable other countries to actually get into production. The argument can always be made that these things may be used against us. That is true. That is true in connection with everything we put out under the Marshall plan and the Truman doctrine, and all of these other benefits that we have sent to off-shore areas. I would like to see the committee recommend such an amendment when the bill comes up for reading under the 5-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] has expired.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may require to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this legislation, and it is a high honor and privilege indeed to make the closing statement of this debate.

American troops today are engaged in active combat. They need every assistance we can give them and our Nation must put its shoulder to the wheel unitedly and to our utmost capacity in order to maintain American prestige in the family of Nations.

The discussion today in the House of Representatives has been one of the best and most informative proceedings I have witnessed during my entire service in Congress. There have been many speeches so outstanding that I plan to keep the record of this debate in my permanent files and I know that students of history will have occasion to refer to these proceedings many times in the years ahead.

I deeply appreciate having the privilege of joining in the discussion long enough to call the attention of the House of Representatives to the historical background bearing on the great issues confronting us here.

While the discussions today have primarily covered the events and the policies of the immediate past, they are the inevitable outgrowth of more than a century of rivalry and conflict between the free nations of the world and Russia. Alexis de Tocqueville, of France, in 1831, visited the United States to inquire into what was then hailed as the great experiment in constitutional liberty. Coming to North America shortly after the pronouncement of the Monroe Doctrine, De Tocqueville was acquainted with the major currents of national developments in Europe which, in view of subsequent events, he described with remarkable precision.

Writing about 1835 in his Democracy in America—P. F. Collier & Son, 1900, volume I, page 441—he summarized his views with unusual clarity:

> There are, at the present time, two great nations in the world which seem to tend toward the same end, although they started from different points: I allude to the Russians and the Americans. Both of them have grown up unnoticed; and whilst the attention of mankind was directed elsewhere, they have suddenly assumed a most prominent place amongst the nations; and the world learned their existence and their greatness at almost the same time.
>
> All other nations seem to have nearly reached their natural limits, and only to be charged with the maintenance of their power; but these are still in the act of growth; all the others are stopped, or continue to advance with extreme difficulty; these are proceeding with ease and with celerity along a path to which the human eye can assign no term. The American struggles against the natural obstacles which oppose him; the adversaries of the Russian are men; the former combats the wilderness and savage life; the latter, civilization with all its weapons and its arts; the conquests of the one are therefore gained by the ploughshare; those of the other by the sword.
> The Anglo-American relies upon personal interest to accomplish his ends, and gives free scope to the unguided exertions and common sense of the citizens; the Russian centers all the authority of society in a single arm; the principal instrument of the former is freedom; of the latter servitude. Their starting point is different, and their courses are not the same; yet each of them seems to be marked out by the will of Heaven to sway the destinies of half the globe.

Just before the outbreak of the Crimean War in 1853 between France and England on the one hand and Russia on the other, Lord Palmerston, British Foreign Minister for many years and Prime Minister for nearly 10 years, spoke of the czardom and its methods as follows:

> The policy and practice of the Russian Government has always been to push forward its encroachments as fast and as far as the apathy or want of firmness of other governments would allow it, but always to stop and retire when it was met with decided resistance. In furtherance of this policy, the Russian Government has always had two strings to its bow, moderate language and disinterested professions at Petersburg and London; active aggression by its agents on the scene of operations.

It is equally interesting to read these same basic ideas, further developed a few years later in 1856 by Commodore M. C. Perry, which I quoted in an extension of my remarks in the RECORD of January 18, 1950.

During the last 40 years the march of events, as clearly foreseen by De Tocqueville, Palmerston, and Perry, have brought the situation anticipated by them closer. Two world wars, by destroying the great stabilizing military powers separating the antagonistic exponents of despotism and constitutional liberty, have served to hasten foreseen events toward their culmination.

Throughout it all we have failed to develop a consistent foreign policy based upon our true national interests. For years such policy, as we have had, has sprung from pure political expediency and opportunism without the slightest regard for the basic considerations of our permanent welfare and stability, or for the great principles upon which our Government was founded.

The debate today brings home to the American people proof that the legislative branch of our great Government is now thoroughly alert to the shaping of our destiny. With a Nation united and with the coordinated help of the free nations of this earth we will meet the challenge hurled at us from behind the iron curtain.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I require, which will not be long.

Mr. Chairman, we are here under a somewhat unusual rule, in that the debate is to run through the course of the day. The minority have had considerable to say and they have also been facing a party conference to elect a minority clerk, which will take place in this room as soon as we adjourn today.

Under this rule, I presume it would have been the right of the majority to require the chairman to hold an even balance on the time. That has not been done, and we Republicans have had the time to express ourselves fully even though we took more than our exact half of the afternoon. I want to express my appreciation to our courteous, courageous, patient, and patriotic chairman, Judge KEE, for the bipartisan way in which he has permitted the debate to proceed this afternoon.

Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD].

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the remarks of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL], who has been a constant supporter of this legislation and who is wholeheartedly in favor of this bill, be placed in the RECORD at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Chairman, the shadow of the Korean crisis looms over us as we debate this legislation to extend the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949. We are concerned with hard, brutal, fast-moving facts, rather than theories or possibilities. United States forces are engaged in what may well be a long and bitter struggle to restore peace in the Far East. This Nation once again has demonstrated its ability to act quickly and decisively in a crisis, and the United Nations has shown the strength and will to take effective international action against aggressors.

These momentous events have occurred in the few short weeks since the pending legislation was drafted. They have demonstrated beyond question the necessity for the free nations of the world to continue mutual defense assistance measures. Nothing we can say here in debate regarding this bill can be as convincing an argument as the actual march of world events.

Just 6 months ago, a bill providing $60,000,000 for economic aid to Korea came to a vote on the floor of the House, and failed of passage by one vote. A few weeks later, wiser judgment prevailed and the House passed a Korean-aid bill.

Unfortunately, however, even this bill was a scaled-down version of the bill passed by the Senate. I voted for and gave my full support to both of these aid bills, as I did regarding the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949. I sincerely hope that those Members who voted against these bills now have been convinced by hard facts that this program is necessary.

Of the total authorization of $1,222,500,000 contained in S. 3809, only $16,000,000 is allocated to Korea and the Philippines. My first thought when the Korean crisis developed was that this sum should be increased substantially. However, investigation has convinced me that such action will not be necessary for the effective prosecution of the efforts to resist the north Korean aggressors. In the first place, the $75,000,000 which would be authorized for the general area of China could be allocated to Korea, and the President has authority under the bill to transfer approximately $100,000,000 from other titles of the bill for Korean aid is necessary. In addition, the bill provides authority for the transfer of up to $250,000,000 in excess equipment, and as much of this as is needed could go to the south Korean forces.

Secondly, we must remember that our own military operations in Korea will be financed by appropriations to the Armed Forces, rather than under the authorization of funds for the mutual defense assistance program. The general appropriations bill is before the Senate, and any additional appropriation for the Armed Forces can be made easily and without delay. These facts indicate that there is no pressing need to increase the authorization contained in S. 3809 for aid to Korea.

Mr. Chairman, it is natural for us to lay stress on the Korean crisis in our consideration of this bill. However, the bill is much more far-reaching in its purposes. The great bulk of the aid which would be authorized by S. 3809 is designed for the North Atlantic nations and for Greece, Turkey, and Iran. The fundamental importance of this bill is not its provisions for Korean aid; it is that this legislation is an essential part of our efforts to prevent an outbreak of aggression anywhere in the world.

When the North Korean forces marched below the thirty-eighth parallel they initiated a psychological as well as a military attack. The men behind the Korean attack have far broader objectives than the subjugation of the South Korean forces; they are striking a blow at the minds of men and women in all the nations outside the Soviet orbit. They are hoping to build fear and timidity in the nations of western Europe and the Middle East, and to tear down the will of these countries to stand against aggression.

Consider the effect upon the world if President Truman had not acted promptly and decisively in Korea. Any weakness upon our part would have been interpreted as a warning that the United States would not back up the free nations in the event of pressure from Russia or her satellites. A crippling blow would have been struck at the North Atlantic Pact and all our other efforts to unite the free world against aggression.

Undoubtedly the planners of the North Korean attack were hoping that we would display weakness rather than strength. Once again, they have underestimated the united will of the American people.

The Korean attack was not an isolated incident. It is part of a plan which has included the guerrilla warfare in Greece, the attempt to set up a puppet government in Iran, the Czechoslovakian coup, the Berlin blockade, and the inciting of strife and disunity in Italy, France, and the Far East. We may assume that this is not the last incident in the series. Pressure of one sort or another will be applied wherever it appears the non-Russian nations are weakest. It is our task to do everything possible to eliminate weak spots, and thus to preserve peace.

The nations which will be aided by Senate bill 3809 are in critical areas of the world. Iran, for instance, is adjacent to the Russian border, and it is under constant pressure to enter the Soviet fold. In Greece, the guerrilla forces have been checked, but there still is a Communist nucleus in the nation, and guerrilla forces across the frontier in Bulgaria could cause a flare-up of the civil war. Turkey occupies an extremely strategic position, and her continued resistance to communism is vital. Guerrilla warfare in the Philippines is menacing the security of that nation, and strife and disunity are present in other nations of the Far East. There is no need to emphasize the necessity of building up the strength of our partners in the North Atlantic Pact, for a major portion of our entire postwar peace effort has been devoted to increasing the strength and stability of the nations of western Europe.

The present bill continues the policies laid down in the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949. These policies are based on the North Atlantic Treaty. Since the treaty went into effect on August 24, 1949, the North Atlantic Council has become a working organization, bilateral agreements with the North Atlantic nations have been signed, a unified concept for the integrated defense of the North Atlantic nations has been agreed upon, and substantial deliveries of military matériel have been made.

As Senator CONNALLY, the distinguished chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said during the Senate debate on Senate bill 3809:

> I think it is safe to say that never before in our peacetime history has so much constructive planning been accomplished by so many nations in such a short period of time.

We must continue this program and accelerate it if possible. In Korea we have learned that there is no quick or easy method of checking a determined aggressor. Through the principle of mutual assistance and self-help, the free nations must increase their collective strength.

Mr. Chairman, the passage of this bill will make possible the continuation of this vital program. In addition, it will be an indication to the Soviet states, as well as the nations outside of the Russian orbit, that the United States is strong and determined. It will be a clear demonstration of our united will to maintain peace and freedom in the world. The mutual-defense-assistance program, like the action now being taken in Korea, is thoroughly consistent with the principles laid down in the United Nations Charter. It is action in support of peace, not war. An overwhelming majority of the people of the United States are united behind this program. I am confident that the House will give its prompt approval to this most necessary measure.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, I want to take this opportunity to thank the acting leader on the minority side, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS], for the very fine compliment he paid to me this afternoon. I want to say that I have not shown to him any more courtesies than he has always shown to me, and it has always been a pleasure to be associated with him in any effort for the common good.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MILLS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 3809) to amend the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, had come to no resolution thereon.

COMMITTEE ON RULES

Mr. KEE. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], chairman of the Committee on Rules, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules may have until midnight tonight to file eight privileged reports.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

MILITARY STRENGTH OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, the New York Herald Tribune of July 12 carries a column by Joseph and Stewart Alsop in which these writers state that "Not more than three divisions"—outside of Germany—"are in a condition of partial readiness." They go on to say that "although ostensibly the United States disposes of nine and a half Army divisions and two marine divisions, this is paper strength." The point the Alsops hope to make is we have not appropriated sufficient funds to our Armed Forces since the end of World War II and that we should step up our appropriation several billions.

But an entirely different question is involved here, if their figures regarding our puny military strength are correct.

Since the close of World War II, Congress has allocated roughly $60,000,000,000 to our Armed Forces. Is it possible that the expenditure of all this money—roughly 10 times the annual cost of our total Federal Government before World War II—has resulted only in a partial preparation of only three fighting divisions outside of Germany? This is a serious matter and, I hope, one which we will examine closely without delay. For the defense dollar has no meaning unless it is related to value received. We must answer this question immediately and if we have received little in return for our outlay, then we must act with dispatch to correct this dangerous situation, no matter what the individual consequences.

I am sending a copy of this statement to Secretary Johnson for his comment.

THE ARMY'S NEW ARTIFICIAL HAND

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, in these days when we are hearing of the fearful casualties in Korea it is nice to read about the things that have been done to alleviate the distress and agony of mind of arm and hand amputees not only of the last war, but of the present war, and also civilians. I would like to praise a group of Army men who have devoted day after day and day after day to this tedious, not uninteresting, but difficult, work of developing an improved artificial hand, the universal hand. But they worked even with enthusiasm because their cause is great. It is their first major product.

The prosthetic device is almost indistinguishable from the real thing and has a comparable efficiency of 40 to 60 percent, according to the developers.

May I say that it is fortunate this has been done because up to a few years ago nothing then was done to assist men who lost their hands and their arms. The amputees had only archaic aids to use.

The following is the article which appeared in this morning's paper:

ARMY'S NEW ARTIFICIAL HAND DEEMED 40 TO 60 PERCENT EFFICIENT

A crew of Army men, working quietly for 4 years, yesterday unveiled its first major product—the universal hand.

The prosthetic device is almost indistinguishable from the real thing and has a comparable efficiency of 40 to 60 percent, according to the developers, the prosthetic research laboratory of the Army Medical Center here. It is the seventh in line of steadily improving models.

Virgil Pittman, 24-year-old former Air Force buck sergeant, of Indianhead, Md., demonstrated the deft facility of the mechanical hand for newsmen yesterday. He lost all but a short stump of an arm in an auto accident last November.

FACILITIES JOINED

Lt. Col. Maurice J. Fletcher, laboratory director, told how the project to help amputees was developed. Back in October 1945 an artificial-hand laboratory was opened and about 6 months later this was blended, with other phases of research, into the prosthetics laboratory.

After hundreds of studies of existing material on artificial limb design gave little hope for a really successful hand, the laboratory set about on "completely fundamental research in the development of prosthetic devices."

The first major work is the mechanical hand. Its development involved studies of exact positioning and curvature of fingers, anthropomorphic characteristics, size and coloring, and also mechanical phases, such as pressure required for security of grasp, ease of maintenance and movement, tolerable weight, practical methods of manufacture and cost.

MECHANICAL THUMB

The developed device has a mechanical thumb, index and second finger, and operates on a voluntary-motion basis, with a built-in automatic lock for greater security of grasp.

While this research was going forward, plastic workers were concentrating on a cosmetic glove to cover the mechanism—one which would be tinted to match a person's skin tones, was easily cleanable and readily replaceable.

To provide individuality, the workers added small skin blemishes, freckles, and nail bruises, and threaded in nylon matched to the patient's hair.

This accomplished, amputees tested the hand in all ways of daily life, in each case making some reference to the hand, and in most situations the public was unaware the hand was not real, Colonel Fletcher said.

One amputee, a ticket taker in a theater, accidentally singed a portion of the hand. A patron, spotting the mark, declared:

"That looks like the same ailment I have. If you like, I'll give you the name of a good ointment to cure it."

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM FOR THE BALANCE OF THE WEEK

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the majority leader as to the program for the rest of the week?

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, following disposition of the military assistance bill, the next order of business will be consideration of the bill (S. 2822) to amend the Federal Deposit Insurance Act. The rule on that bill provides for 2 hours general debate.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. That will be taken up tomorrow if consideration of the present bill is concluded?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes. There are eight rules reported on bills concerning the Federal Judiciary. These bills will be brought up.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Eight different bills?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

These bills will be brought up with the understanding, however, that if rules are reported or other legislation which the leadership feels should have priority they will not be called up one after the other.

Would the gentleman like me to state what these judgeship bills are?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. These bills are as follows:

H. R. 5137, to provide for the appointment of an additional Federal judge for the eastern district of Texas.

H. R. 6450, providing two additional judgeships for the Northern District of Illinois.

H. R. 7009, to repeal the proviso against filling of the vacancy in the office of district judge for the eastern and western districts of Missouri. Someone has stated to me that this has a relationship to our old friend Dick Duncan. Those who were here when Dick Duncan was a Member of the House will remember what a valuable Member he was.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. There is no political favoritism in any of these bills?

Mr. McCORMACK. Oh, no.

The next is H. R. 6836, to repeal prohibition against filling the vacancy in the office of district judge for the district of Delaware. I think our friend from Delaware [Mr. BOGGS] is very much interested in that bill.

The next one is H. R. 6869, to repeal prohibition against filling of the vacancy in the office of district judge for the western district of Pennsylvania.

H. R. 6240, to authorize the appointment of a district judge for the northern and southern districts of Indiana.

H. R. 7570, providing for an additional district judge for the northern district of Ohio.

H. R. 3775, providing for an additional district judge for the third division of the district of Alaska.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Did I understand from the majority leader that those bills had already received Rules Committee clearance?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes; rules have been reported out.

Mr. KEATING. Today?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. Does the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary appear in support of those bills?

Mr. McCORMACK. I am unable to state that.

Mr. KEATING. I was opposed to the bills and was told to come before the Rules Committee tomorrow morning at 11:15. I wonder if it is possible the majority leader might have been misinformed as to these bills having Rules Committee clearance?

Mr. McCORMACK. I can state upon competent authority that the eight of them have been reported out. Prior to that I would have stated to the best of my information and belief, but now I have been advised by authority that I consider is most competent that they have been reported.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I am sure the Rules Committee will be glad to hear the gentleman on tomorrow just the same.

Mr. KEATING. I have no doubt about that. Normally I do not like to be treated in that manner and I know the majority leader would not like it. I feel sure that there has been some misunderstanding between the distinguished gentleman of the Committee on the Judiciary and myself, since he told me this morning that the hearing would be tomorrow morning on these judgeship bills before the Committee on Rules. The matter came up while the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and myself were attending another hearing, and at that time the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary directed his secretary to defer the hearing on these particular bills until tomorrow morning before the Committee on Rules. That is the last I heard of it, and knowing the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary as I do, I feel sure that there has been some misunderstanding in the matter and would not, for a moment, care to leave the implication that anything has been done without my knowledge and over my objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Might I state that I know nothing about that, except that about which I was informed, and now it has been confirmed, that these rules have been reported out, and I wanted to advise the membership of the House that they would be brought up from time to time. If the gentleman from New York has any understanding otherwise, I really know nothing about that. I am just giving the information to the House.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I might add, I think that those rules were reported out with the understanding that there will be Republican judges named in each of these vacancies, with the exception of one, probably.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am sure that the gentleman from Ohio wields tremendous influence everywhere.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mrs. NORTON, from the Committee on House Administration, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 5966. An act to adjust and define the boundary between Great Smoky Mountains National Park and the Cherokee-Pisgah-Nantahala National Forests and for other purposes.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JULY 19, 1950

(Legislative day of Saturday, July 1, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Rev. L. Oakey Wilburn, D. D., superintendent, Petersburg, Va., district, the Methodist Church, offered the following prayer:

O God, make us eternally grateful for Thy many mercies. Give us a feeling of gratitude, too, for Thy loving forgiveness through the ages. As we call upon Thee this day, may we exalt Thee and praise Thy name in the land of a people who stand for freedom.

In an hour of trouble and anxious concern, help us to be steady and to have the judgment to mark out a way that is sure and secure before Thee. Ever be with those who serve wherever they may be and in whatever service they are called upon to tender. Give comfort to every soul who feels so keenly the stress and strain in these hours.

Upon these on whom depends so much, and on whom so many depend, give Thy grace and the power of Thy Holy Spirit, that they may make wise decisions. May there be none in our land who will not stand for time-honored and proven principles that bring justice and righteousness.

Above all else, make our faith equal to our needs at all times. In Jesus' name we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

PHOTOGRAPH-TAKING IN SENATE CHAMBER

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHERRY. I thought it was against the rules of the Senate to take a picture of the Senate while it was in session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is against the rules.

Mr. WHERRY. Then I ask the distinguished President of the Senate to see to it that the rule is enforced, for certainly there was a flash here just a moment ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair observed the flash, but he is advised that it was outside the Senate Chamber.

Mr. WHERRY. There was certainly a flash inside the Senate Chamber, but I do not know where the camera is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest that if any photographer took a picture of the Senate Chamber when it is in session, the Sergeant at Arms see to it that it is not developed.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is advised that what happened was that some photographer took a picture of the gentleman conveying the message of the President as he came into the Senate Chamber.

Mr. WHERRY. I was of the view that the flash was inside the Senate Chamber, and I believed it was in violation of the rules if that had happened; but if it was outside the Senate Chamber, it is perfectly agreeable to me. It was a pretty strong flash, to get inside the Senate Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair agrees that it was a strong flash.

REPORT ON KOREAN SITUATION AND RECOMMENDATIONS FOR LEGISLATIVE ACTION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 646)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

(For President's message, see pp. 10626–10630 of House proceedings in today's RECORD.)

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, the message of the President of the United States obviously speaks for itself. However, I think that, after every Senator has listened to the message, we all must realize the gravity of the situation which today exists in America and in the world.

The President has presented in his message a broad program for the expanding of our Armed Forces. He has requested that we stand firmly back of the United Nations Organization, and he has also asked that the productive power of America be placed into operation in order that we may check the aggressive action of the Northern Koreans and of all others who may come to their aid.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the message is one of real importance. I think everyone can see that the leadership of the Commander in Chief at this particular time is firm, courageous, and superb. I am satisfied that the Congress of the United States and the great majority of the American people will support the Chief Executive of the Nation in the request he makes in this unusual hour of peril.

Mr. President, a bill has accompanied the message, which is in the hands of the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK] who, I understand, will handle the proposed legislation before his committee.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to make the shortest speech perhaps that I have ever made in the Senate, by way of comment on the historic message which the President sent to the Congress today. I wish to say I think it was a good American message, issued by a good American. I intend to support it to the limit.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senators be permitted to present petitions and memorials, file reports, introduce bills and joint resolutions, and submit routine matters for the RECORD, without debate and without speeches.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I am in full accord with the request of the majority leader, with the exception of the filing of the report by the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. I feel that when that report is filed there will be some questions asked. I trust that the Senator will not include the report in his unanimous-consent request.

Mr. LUCAS. If the Senator is going to object, I shall withhold the request.

Mr. WHERRY. I am not objecting to the request with reference to insertions in the RECORD, or the filing of anything except that one item which I have mentioned. I think the Senator will agree with me that if questions are to be asked there should be time allowed for that purpose.

Mr. LUCAS. Of course, sooner or later the report of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], as chairman of the subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee handling the resolution adopted by the Senate some time ago, will be filed. I thought perhaps it might be filed at this time, and then, later on, we can discuss it, and the Senator from Nebraska or any other Senator who desires to raise any question regarding it may do so. But I think the report should be filed at this time.

Mr. WHERRY. I should be perfectly willing to agree to the insertion of anything in the RECORD, reserving the filing of the report to which I have referred. I think the Senator from Illinois might modify his request, so that when the report is filed, and any Senator wants to ask questions about it, his rights will be protected.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I do not understand that the general request prevents objection to any individual item.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would state in that connection that while it has been customary, during these more or less informal morning hours, that the majority leader or other Senators ask unanimous consent that Senators be permitted to file bills, reports, petitions, memorials, or other matters, the Chair feels that the consent applies to all Senators and that each individual Senator does not have to ask again that he be permitted to file a petition or a memorial or introduce a bill. Notwithstanding that fact, through custom, Senators do ask unanimous consent. The Chair does not think it is necessary for each Senator to ask unanimous consent. It is a substitute for the morning hour when there has been an adjournment, and in that hour Senators do not have to ask unanimous consent to file reports, petitions, or memorials or introduce bills.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, the only reason for including the filing of reports was to avoid the necessity of having a regular morning hour. I hoped that the Senate might recess today until tomorrow as we have been doing. If there is objection, I shall be glad to withhold my request.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to say again to my distinguished friend that there is no objection at all to Senators inserting anything they want to insert in the RECORD, without debate, but the point has been raised that it requires unanimous consent, as I am quite satisfied it does, to file the report. So I ask the distinguished majority leader if he will not accept a modification of his request, so as to provide that when it comes times to file the report opportunity will be afforded Senators to ask questions or to make a few observations concerning the report. That will happen at some time. I am certainly agreeable to the request of the Senator, with that single exception. If the Senator will modify his request so that questions can be asked and answered concerning the report, without asking for the regular order, the Senator from Nebraska will agree.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I am satisfied that there will be all kinds of questions asked about the report. The Senator from Illinois certainly has no intention of preventing any Senator from making any statement he desires to make regarding the report. No Senator on this side of the aisle has any objection to that. The report must be filed today, tomorrow, or at some time. After the report is filed any questions can be raised which the minority desires to raise. It seems to me we are merely delaying the filing of the report.

I shall withhold my request with reference to the report. It can be filed during the morning hour, and the same procedure will occur. It is not debatable during that time. After the morning hour we can take it up and debate it, and any Senator at that particular time will have an opportunity to discuss it pro and con.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I may say to the distinguished majority leader, in all sincerity, that I agree entirely with that procedure. That will have to happen if unanimous consent is not now granted. There is no disposition on this side of the aisle to delay the filing of the report, because it will be filed in the morning hour if unanimous consent to file it at this time is not granted. I should be glad to have it filed now, if it be the understanding that motions may be made with reference to it and that it may be debated tomorrow. If the Senator from Illinois would rather have it taken up tomorrow, that is agreeable to me. If he wants unanimous consent now, I shall be glad to agree, with the modification which I have suggested.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I do not think it makes much difference one way or the other. I shall ask the chairman of the subcommittee if he wishes to go along with the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska and file the report during the morning hour.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, on yesterday, when I was requested to delay the filing of the report, I acceded to the wishes of some Senators on the other side of the aisle. They asked me to delay filing the report until they could look at it, and they said it would be all right to present it today. So I acceded to their request. They have all had an opportunity to look at it. The filing of the report now would not preclude any action taken on the resolutions to have the report printed. It would not preclude any action I can envisage that may be taken tomorrow or next day, without any prejudice at all to any position which any Senator may want to take in the future.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. This is a unanimous-consent request. I ask the Senator from Illinois if he will not modify his request so that all Senators may be permitted to ask questions, participate in debate, raise any issue, or make any appropriate motion concerning the report, and that consideration of the matter shall not be terminated by a demand for the regular order prior to the disposition thereof. If the Senator would accept such a modification, it would be perfectly agreeable to proceed with the filing of the report.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not agree to that. I withdraw that part of the unanimous-consent request dealing with the filing of reports.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois that Senators be permitted to present peitions and memorials, introduce bills and joint resolutions, make insertions in the RECORD, and submit routine matters for the RECORD, except reports of committees, without speeches and without debate?

Mr. WHERRY. Reserving the right to object, and I am not going to object to the general suggestion, but I think the unanimous-consent request should include provision that objection may be made by an individual Senator to anything which may come up during this so-called morning hour if it relates to the subject already mentioned.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair cannot anticipate what may arise on a report which has not been filed. Unanimous consent is required to file a report, except during the morning hour. During the morning hour, when we reach the category of reports it can be filed but it cannot be debated during the morning hour.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I intend to object, I do not think a procedure by which we give unanimous consent in advance to anything being brought in should be granted. I never thought that would be the effect of what is being done this year. We never did it before. It seems to me that all we intended to do when we adopted this rather informal procedure of having a morning hour was simply to set aside temporarily the pending business so that unanimous-consent requests may be made. If the Senator is now asking for a general unanimous-consent request which has the effect of providing for a morning hour when there is no morning hour, I shall hereafter object to all such requests. The Chair has interpreted that kind of request to be something that I never thought it would be up to this moment. He has interpreted it to mean that we must waive all right to object to any unanimous-consent request which may be made, or to the filing of reports, introduction of bills, or any other procedure. If we want to get into that situation we ought to have a regular morning hour, when 2 hours are available to conduct the whole operation and consider all such matters. If the request is interpreted as the Chair has interpreted it, I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was interpreting the procedure in the light of the requests which are usually made. Usually a request is made that Senators be permitted to introduce bills and joint resolutions, make routine insertions in the RECORD, and so forth. Heretofore it has included the making of reports. If it has been the intention of the Senator making the request, and of the Senate, merely to give an opportunity for a Senator to have unanimous consent to do these things, the Chair's comment is subject to modification. However, the Chair had in mind in the comment he made that usually the request is that Senators be permitted to do these things. It is not an important matter so far as the Chair is concerned.

Mr. LUCAS. It seems to me that the able Senator from Ohio is taking a rather strange view of the pronouncement made by the Vice President with respect to what we are attempting to do. We are merely trying to serve the convenience of Senators who come to the floor of the Senate immediately following the convening of the Senate and desire to make requests to place matters in the RECORD, introduce bills, and so forth, more or less as is done during a regular morning hour. If we do not proceed in that way, and the Senate recesses from day to day, Members of the Senate will come in during the day and ask the Senator who has the floor to yield for that purpose. The whole theory is to finish that part of the business of the Senate before we take up the consideration of the pending or unfinished business. It is merely a matter of convenience for Senators.

It is perfectly all right for the Senator from Ohio to object, but when he objects he is actually inconveniencing many Senators who desire to present such matters.

Mr. TAFT. Ordinarily when we have pending business before the Senate a Senator is recognized to speak on the pending business, and in that case, if it is desired to present routine matters, all that is necessary to do is to ask that temporarily and on condition that the Senator making the request will not attempt to indulge in debate, he may be recognized for a limited purpose, namely, to ask unanimous consent. However, anyone ought to have a right to object at any time to any Senator's making such a unanimous-consent request to file a report or take any other action which could be objected to during the pendency of unfinished business.

Mr. LUCAS. The unanimous-consent requests which have been made by the majority leader during the past year and during the present year have been requests to permit Members to introduce bills, present petitions and memorials, and so forth. I repeat that it is difficult for me to understand how the able Senator from Ohio could object to that type of procedure. It has been in vogue ever since I have been a Member of the United States Senate. It has been done right along, and it has been done solely for the purpose of giving Senators an opportunity to transact routine business. They can do that under a general request immediately after the first quorum call is had, following which they can go to committee hearings, or go to lunch, or anywhere else, if they do not desire to stay on the floor. However, if this objection is made, one Senator after another will come to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, during the course of the debate of the pending bill, to ask him to yield for the purpose of making an insertion in the RECORD. It seems to me that the procedure we have followed is absolutely in order. I believe it is the proper procedure, and no one should object to it. If it is objected to, we shall have to go into a morning hour every morning.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. This question has arisen time and time again. I know that many Senators have the same opinion of the right of an individual Senator to object to a general unanimous-consent request which is usually made at the beginning of the session after the Senate convenes following a recess. I hope the Senator from Ohio will agree with the theory, and I hope that he will withdraw his objection to a general request for the making of insertions in the RECORD on the assurance of the minority leader that nothing will come up or pertain to the filing of the report in question.

Mr. LUCAS. I have already withdrawn that request. No reports can be filed under that situation.

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct.

Mr. LUCAS. I have tried to do everything I can with respect to this report. So far as I am concerned, nothing will be brought up regarding it. But, regardless of so-called unanimous-consent requests, the moment the appropriation bill is under consideration, a Senator cannot be prevented from taking the floor, if he so desires, and speaking all afternoon on the report.

Mr. WHERRY. I understand the parliamentary procedure outlined by the distinguished majority leader. I am simply trying to accomplish what he wants done. If the majority leader now understands the situation, which I am sure he does, no objection will be made to the general unanimous-consent request for insertions in the RECORD. However, I want to say that I hold to the opinion that an individual Senator has a right,and should have a right, to object, because he cannot know in advance what is coming up under a general unanimous-consent request. With the assurance of the majority leader that the purpose of the unanimous-consent request is as outlined. I shall certainly not object to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would like to clarify the situation. If it is the desire of the Senate that during this so-called informal morning hour Senators be allowed only to ask unanimous consent to do what they want to do, the request ought to be put in that form. If it is the wish of the Senate, on a request by any Senator, that Senators be permitted to introduce bills and make routine insertions in the RECORD, it ought to be so stated. If a Senator gets general consent of the Senate that Senators be permitted to file such matters, the Chair still thinks that he was right in his interpretation that it is not necessary for each individual Senator to get consent again. If the Senate does not wish to go that far, but merely have Senators ask unanimous consent to insert matters in the RECORD, or introduce bills, the Chair would like to know it, so that he may follow the wishes of the Senate in that regard.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I renew my request, with the filing of reports of committees excluded from the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. TAFT. There is usually included in the request the words "without debate and without speeches." That does not necessarily do away with the morning hour. It seems to me that the request should be so framed that Senators who desire to act under the request should be required to obtain unanimous consent, or at least objection should be permitted, as would be the case at any other time. I would object to any general request which would have the effect, therefore, of suspending the ordinary practice of requiring Senators to ask unanimous consent during the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I regret that the Senator from Ohio has objected. I withdraw the unanimous-consent request, and from now on I presume we will have to have a morning hour every morning.

I wish to make another unanimous-consent request, and I sincerely hope the Senator from Ohio will not object. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK] may be permitted to introduce a bill involving legislation suggested by the President of the United States this morning in his message.

Mr. TAFT. If the Senator will yield, let me say that I have not the faintest objection to the Senator from South Carolina introducing the bill. Of course he can obtain unanimous consent for himself, and any other Senator could do the same, so long as the Senator in charge of the unfinished business does not object to it as interfering with that business. I do not think the Senator needs to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] has not made any objection to any unanimous-consent request I have made, so apparently my requests are not interfering with the business of the Senate, from his viewpoint, on this side of the aisle. They are only interfering with the business of the Senator from Ohio.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois that the Senator from South Carolina be permitted to introduce a bill? The Chair hears none.

DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT OF 1950

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, as chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency I introduce, by request, a bill which, as stated by the distinguished Senator from Illinois, is in keeping with the President's message.

The bill (S. 3936) to establish a system of priorities and allocations for materials and facilities, authorize the requisitioning thereof, provide financial assistance for expansion of productive capacity and supply, strengthen controls over credit, regulate speculation on commodity exchanges, and by these measures facilitate the production of goods and services necessary for the national security, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MAYBANK, was read twice by its title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would like to suggest that the President's message deals with a number of subjects. The bill introduced by the Senator from South Carolina, which the Chair has examined, deals with a portion of the President's message having to do with controls, allocations, and various other matters that come under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking and Currency. If and when bills are introduced dealing with other portions of the President's message, they will be sent to the appropriate committees at the time of their introduction.

The Chair refers the bill introduced by the Senator from South Carolina to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I greatly appreciate what the distinguished Vice President has just said. I also wish to call attention to the fact that in this bill there are certain references to the Commodity Exchange Act and to commodity trading, and I am going to consult with the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry before anything is done with reference to this section. The other sections of the bill, in my judgment, come under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. President, I now ask that there be printed following my remarks a summary and analysis of the proposed Defense Production Act of 1950, a copy of the bill, and a statement prepared by me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The summary and analysis are as follows:

SUMMARY AND ANALYSIS OF PROPOSED DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT OF 1950

PART A—SUMMARY OF BILL

The proposed "Defense Production Act of 1950" is designed to meet the increasing demand for production for the Armed Forces by giving to the President certain authority to provide for the diversion of existing facilities, materials, goods and services from civilian use to military purposes and for the expansion of productive facilities.

In addition to a declaration of policy the bill consists of five titles providing the authority needed to channel facilities and materials into military and essential civilian uses, to finance increased productive capacity and a larger supply of materials, and to control consumer and real estate credit and speculation in commodities.

The first two titles are designed to assure the effective utilization of materials and facilities for essential purposes. Title I authorizes the President to require that defense contracts must be accepted and performed in preference to all other contracts, and gives him authority to control materials and facilities in such fashion and on such conditions as will assure availability for military and essential civilian needs. Title II authorizes the President to requisition property needed for national defense and to pay fair compensation for the property taken.

Title III provides in two ways for the expansion of productive capacity and an increase in the supply of essential materials. First, it authorizes the guaranty of loans made by public and private financing institutions to persons producing for national defense, and second, it authorizes the President, through the RFC or other corporations created for the purpose, to make direct loans to private enterprise for essential production and to purchase, either for Government use or for resale, metals, minerals, and other raw materials necessary to meet military and essential civilian needs.

Title IV is designed to control various forms of credit and the speculation in commodities. Subtitle A provides direct statutory authority for the President to regulate consumer credit, a control similar to that previously applied under authority of section 5 (b) of the Trading With the Enemy Act and Executive Order 8843. It also authorizes the President to restrict the terms upon which loans for real estate and housing may be made. Subtitle B amends the Commodity Exchange Act to authorize the President to regulate margin requirements for commodity trading.

Title V carries the general provisions applicable to all titles. Among other things, it entitles the President to obtain information necessary to exercise the proposed powers, to make necessary regulations and delegations of authority, and to employ persons in the top three grades established by the Classification Act of 1949, all limited to the purposes of the act. It also provides an exemption from liability arising out of compliance with regulations issued under the act and from antitrust prosecution for activities requested by the President for defense purposes. Necessary appropriations are authorized.

PART B—SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF THE BILL

Section 2, declaration of policy: This section reaffirms the policy of the United States to oppose aggression by means of collective action through the United Nations and regional arrangements, and further declares that in order to maintain the military and economic strength required under present circumstances to carry out this purpose, it will be necessary to divert certain materials and facilities from civilian use to military and related purposes and to provide for the expansion of productive facilities beyond the levels needed to meet existing demands. It recognizes that some curtailment and redirection of normal civilian production and purchases will be required, but states that it is the intention of the Congress that the powers granted be used to meet the authorized requirements of the Armed Forces promptly and effectively without imposing undue strains upon wages, prices, and the production and distribution of essential civilian materials.

Title I—Priorities and allocations

Section 101 (a) authorizes the President to require that contracts which he deems necessary or appropriate to promote the national defense shall be accepted and performed by any person found to be capable of performance, and be given preference over all other contracts. He is further authorized to allocate materials and facilities on such terms as he may deem appropriate to promote the national defense. Use of this authority to ration consumer goods at the retail level is expressly prohibited.

Section 101 (b) provides criminal penalties for willful violations of the provisions of this title or of any rule or regulation issued thereunder.

Title II—Authority to requisition

Section 201 authorizes the President to requisition materials and facilities urgently needed for the national defense. Payment of just compensation as determined by the President is required, but when the person entitled to receive compensation is unwilling to accept such compensation as full payment, he shall be paid 50 percent of the amount and shall be entitled to sue for the remainder within 3 years in the Court of Claims or any district court.

Title III—Expansion of productive capacity and supply

Section 301, loan guaranties: Subsection (a) authorizes the President to provide for the guaranty of loans made by public or private financial institutions to contractors or other persons for defense purposes. The President may authorize the defense departments and other Government agencies to make such guaranties without regard to laws relating to the making, performance, amendment, or modification of contracts.

Section 301 (b) designates the Federal Reserve banks to act as fiscal agents to carry out such guaranties and provides for the utilization of funds of the guaranteeing agency to meet all expenses and losses incurred.

Section 301 (c) authorizes the Federal Reserve Board to prescribe rates of interest and other charges and to issue regulations governing uniform procedures for processing the guaranties.

Section 301 (d) makes available to the guaranteeing agencies for purposes of this section all funds appropriated or allocated to it for national defense purposes.

Section 302, loans for expansion, development, or production: This section gives the President authority to provide for loans to private business enterprises for the expansion of capacity, the development of technological processes or the production of essential materials. Such loans may be made on such terms and conditions as the President deems necessary with two exceptions: Other financial assistance must be unavailable on reasonable terms and that portion of the loan principal used for the purchase or construction of plant or equipment may not exceed 75 percent of the cost of such plant or equipment.

Section 303, purchase of metals, minerals, and other raw materials: Subsection (a) authorizes the President to make purchases or commitments to purchase such metals, minerals, and other raw materials as are necessary to meet military and essential civilian needs.

Section 303 (b) removes the procurement restrictions of other laws and permits the President to make advance payments and prescribe other terms and conditions deemed necessary. The use of premium payments, however, is expressly confined to those cases in which the supply of essential materials cannot be obtained at lower prices.

Section 303 (c) states that the power to purchase includes the power to transport, store, process and refine any materials procured under this section.

Section 304, administration: Subsection (a) authorizes the President, for the purposes of sections 302 and 303, to utilize the RFC and other agencies of the Government or to create and use new corporations.

Section 304 (b) sets out the powers of corporations newly formed under this section. Life of such corporations is limited to June 30, 1952, except for purposes of liquidation, and the authorization to borrow from the Treasury may not exceed $2,000,000,000. Arrangements for issuance of corporate obligations to the Secretary of the Treasury are prescribed.

Title IV—Control of credit and commodity speculation

Subtitle A—Consumer and Real Estate Credit

Section 401 (a) provides for authority similar to that exercised in Regulation W during the past war. It adds, however, controls over real property credit. The President would be authorized, in order to prevent or reduce excessive use of or fluctuations in such credit, to classify transactions and prescribe maximum loans or credit values, minimum down payments, maximum maturities, rates of payments, rules regarding outstanding credit and other related matters. Regulations may include administrative provisions to effectuate the purposes of this section, taking into account changing conditions as to the level and trend of consumer and real estate credit and the effect of the use thereof upon purchasing power, demand for real property and its improvements, and the need for maintenance of sound credit conditions.

Section 401 (b) provides that no person engaged in the business of extending or maintaining consumer or real estate credit shall extend or maintain any credit or do any act in relation thereto in contravention of any regulation prescribed by the President pursuant to this section. Every such person shall keep records and make reports as may be required; all such records shall be subject to periodic or other examinations.

Section 401 (c) provides penalties for violations of this act or of regulations issued thereunder.

Section 401 (d) provides that transactions and persons subject to this section may be required to be registered or licensed; such registration or license may be suspended for violation of this section or any regulation prescribed by the President, after notice and opportunity for hearing. It authorizes utilization of the Federal Reserve Board, Federal Reserve banks, and any other agencies, Federal or State, which are available and appropriate in administering this section.

Section 401 (e) defines terms applicable to this title.

Section 402, housing loans: This section authorizes the President to reduce maximum principal amounts, maximum maturities and the ratios of loan to value or cost of any type of housing loan in which any agency of the Government participates whenever he finds, after considering the effect on the building industry, on the national economy, and on defense production, that such action is necessary. A proviso requiring the retention of a relative preference for veterans is included.

Sec. 403, amendment of section 5A of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act of June 27, 1950: This section provides against the making or purchase of any loan by a member of a Federal home loan bank when its cash and obligations of the United States are not equal to such amount as prescribed by the Home Loan Bank Board within limits prescribed by this section.

Subtitle B—Commodity Speculation

Section 411: This section adds a new paragraph 5 to section 4 (a) of the Commodity Exchange Act. Paragraph 5A of that section will provide that upon determination by the President that the nature or extent of speculative trading on boards of trade causes or threatens to cause sudden or unreasonable fluctuations in price of any commodity, he may prescribe regulations as to margin for purchase or sale of such commodity for future delivery.

Paragraph 5B of that section will provide that buying, selling, or accepting orders for purchase or sale of such commodity for future delivery is unlawful unless margin funds or securities are deposited and maintained in compliance with rules and regulations promulgated under this paragraph. A floor broker acting solely in that capacity shall not be deemed a violator of this paragraph.

Paragraph 5C of that section will provide that money, securities, or property deposited as margin shall be handled in compliance with section 4 (d) (2).

Paragraph 5D of that section will provide that it is unlawful for any person to engage in soliciting or accepting orders for purchase or sale of commodity for future delivery on any board of trade, unless such person keeps written records of such transactions, which shall be kept for 3 years from date of each transaction, and open at all times to inspection by any designated Government representative.

Paragraph 5E of that section will provide that the term "commodity" includes agricultural commodity, product or byproduct thereof.

Paragraph 5F of that section will provide that the provisions of section 21 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, as amended, are made applicable for administering and enforcing this paragraph 5.

Section 412: This section amends the Agricultural Act of 1949 to authorize the Commodity Credit Corporation, when the President so directs, to sell commodities at the current support price, if not below the market price, for the purpose of stabilizing the market and preventing undue speculation and price fluctuations.

Title V—General provisions

Section 501, small-business participation: This section expresses the policy of encouraging the participation of small firms in programs authorized by this act. It provides for full information concerning the activities of Government agencies and for appropriate representation of small business on industry advisory committees. It also provides for such exemptions for small firms as are feasible and for special procedures designed to expedite their applications, requests, and appeals relative to such participation.

Section 504, authority to issue rules and regulations.

Section 503, delegations of authority and employment of personnel: Any power or authority conferred upon the President by this act may be delegated and redelegated to any officer or agency of the Government. Personnel to carry out the purposes of this act are authorized without regard to section 14 of the Federal Employees Pay Act of 1946.

Section 504, authority to issue rules and regulations.

Section 505, information and reports: Subsection (a) authorizes the President to require the keeping of records and the submission of reports, inspection of books, premises, or property, and the attendance of witnesses by subpena, or otherwise, as may be necessary or appropriate to the enforcement or administration of this act.

Section 505 (b) requires that any individual may be required to testify or produce evidence despite a claim of privilege against self-incrimination but may not be prosecuted or penalized, except for perjury, on account of any transaction covered by such testimony or evidence. This immunity does not insure for such a violator further priorities assistance or the allocation of materials.

Section 505 (c) limits the production of a person's books or records to the place where he usually keeps them if he will furnish the President with a true copy of such books or records or stipulates as to the information contained therein. Fees and mileage for witnesses are the same as in the courts of the United States.

Section 505 (d) provides for nondisclosure of information deemed confidential by the President or for which confidential treatment has been requested by the person supplying the information. Criminal penalties are provided.

Section 506, enforcement: The district courts of the United States and the courts of any territories or places subject to the jurisdiction of the United States are given jurisdiction of violations of this act or regulations under it and of all civil actions or injunctions arising out of this act or any rule or regulation thereunder. Provisions for jurisdiction, process, and the subpena of witnesses are included.

Section 507, exculpatory clause: This section provides an exemption from damage suits resulting from compliance with rules, regulations, or orders issued pursuant to this act.

Section 508, antitrust exemption: This section provides that no act or omission to act requested by the President under this act shall be construed to be within the prohibition of the antitrust laws or the Federal Trade Commission Act. It provides that copies of such requests shall be furnished to the Attorney General and that the authority granted in this section shall be delegated only to a single official of the Government, who will be required to consult with the Attorney General concerning each request.

Section 509, Administrative Procedure Act: Functions of this act are excluded from the operation of the Administrative Procedure Act except as to the requirements of section 3 thereof.

Section 510, exemption from Classification Act of 1949: This section authorizes the President to place positions and employ persons in civil-service grades 16, 17, and 18 without regard to numbers authorized by section 505 of the Classification Act of 1949.

Section 511, appropriations: This section authorizes appropriations necessary to carry out the provisions and purposes of the act and authorizes transfer of funds to any agency designated to assist in carrying out functions under the act.

Section 512, termination: This section states that this act and all authority conferred hereunder shall terminate June 30, 1952.

The text of the bill (S. 3936) introduced by Mr. MAYBANK is as follows:

A bill to establish a system of priorities and allocations for materials and facilities, authorize the requisitioning thereof, provide financial assistance for expansion of productive capacity and supply, strengthen controls over credit, regulate speculation on commodity exchanges, and by these measures facilitate the production of goods and services necessary for the national security, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That this act, divided into titles, may be cited as "The Defense Production Act of 1950."

DECLARATION OF POLICY

SEC. 2. It is the policy of the United States to oppose acts of aggression and to promote peace by insuring respect for world law and the peaceful settlement of differences among nations. To that end this Government is pledged to support collective action through the United Nations and through regional arrangements for mutual defense in conformity with the Charter of the United Nations. The United States is determined to develop and maintain whatever military and economic strength is found to be necessary to carry out this purpose. Under present circumstances, this task requires diversion of certain materials and facilities from civilian use to military and related purposes. It requires expansion of productive facilities beyond the levels needed to meet the civilian demand. In order that this diversion and expansion may proceed at once, and that the national economy may be maintained with the maximum effectiveness and the least hardship, normal civilian production and purchases must be curtailed and redirected.

It is the objective of this act to provide the President with authority to accomplish these adjustments in the operation of the economy. It is the intention of the Congress that the President shall use the powers conferred by this act to promote the national defense, by meeting, promptly and effectively, the requirements of military and other programs in support of our national security and foreign-policy objectives, and by preventing undue strains and dislocations upon wages, prices, and production or distribution of materials for civilian use.

TITLE I—PRIORITIES AND ALLOCATIONS

SEC. 101. The President is hereby authorized (1) to require that performance under contracts or orders (other than contracts of empoyment) which he deems necessary or appropriate to promote the national defense shall take priority over performance under any other contract or order, and, for the purpose of assuring such priority, to require acceptance and performance of such contracts or orders by any person l.e finds to be capable of their performance, and (2) to allocate materials and facilities in such manner, upon such conditions, and to such extent as he shall deem necessary or appropriate to promote the national defense: Provided, That this authority shall not be used to ration at the retail level consumer goods for household or personal use.

SEC. 102. Any person who willfully performs any act prohibited, or willfully fails to perform any act required, by the provisions of this title or any rule, regulation, or order thereunder, shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than 1 year, or both.

TITLE II—AUTHORITY TO REQUISITION

SEC. 201. Whenever the President determines (1) that the use of any equipment, supplies, or component parts thereof, or materials or facilities necessary for the manufacture, servicing, or operation of such equipment, supplies, or component parts, is needed for the national defense, and (2) that such need is immediate and impending and such as will not admit of delay or resort to any other source of supply, he is authorized to requisition such property or the use thereof for the defense of the United States upon the payment of just compensation for such property or the use thereof to be determined as hereinafter provided. The President shall determine the amount of the compensation to be paid for any property or the use thereof requisitioned pursuant to this title but each such determination shall be made as of the time it is requisitioned in accordance with the provision for just compensation in the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. If the person entitled to receive the amount so determined by the President as just compensation is unwilling to accept the same as full and complete compensation for such property or the use thereof he shall be paid 50 percent of such amount and shall be entitled to recover from the United States, in an action brought in the Court of Claims or, where the amount involved does not exceed $10,000, in any district court of the United States within 3 years after the date of the President's award, an additional amount which, when added to the amount so paid to him, shall be just compensation.

TITLE III—EXPANSION OF PRODUCTIVE CAPACITY AND SUPPLY

SEC. 301. (a) In order to expedite production and deliveries under Government contracts, the President may authorize, subject to such regulations as he may prescribe, the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, the Department of the Air Force, the Department of Commerce, and such other agencies of the United States engaged in procurement as he may designate (hereinafter referred to as "guaranteeing agencies"), without regard to provisions of law relating to the making, performance, amendment, or modification of contracts, to guarantee in whole or in part any public or private financing institution (including any Federal Reserve bank), by commitment to purchase, agreement to share losses, or otherwise, against loss of principal or interest on any loan, discount or advance, or on any commitment in connection therewith, which may be made by such financing institution for the purpose of financing any contractor, subcontractor, or other person in connection with the performance, or in connection with or in contemplation of the termination, of any contract or other operation deemed by the guaranteeing agency to be related to efforts or undertakings on the part of the United States or any agency thereof which are designed to meet the necessities of the national defense.

(b) Any Federal agency or any Federal Reserve bank when designated by the President, is hereby authorized to act, on behalf of any guaranteeing agency, as fiscal agent of the United States in the making of such contracts of guarantee and in otherwise carrying out the purposes of this section. All such funds as may be necessary to enable any such fiscal agent to carry out any guarantee made by it on behalf of any guaranteeing agency shall be supplied and disbursed by or under authority from such guaranteeing agency. No such fiscal agent shall have any responsibility or accountability except as agent in taking any action pursuant to or under authority of the provisions of this section. Each such fiscal agent shall be reimbursed by each guaranteeing agency for all expenses and losses incurred by such fiscal agent in acting as agent on behalf of such guaranteeing agency, including among such expenses, notwithstanding any other provision of law, attorneys' fees, and expenses of litigation.

(c) All actions and operations of such fiscal agents, under authority of or pursuant to this section shall be subject to the supervision of the President and to such regulations as he may prescribe; and the President is authorized to prescribe, either specifically or by maximum limits or otherwise, rates of interest, guarantee and commitment fees, and other charges which may be made in connection with loans, discounts, advances, or commitments guaranteed by the guaranteeing agencies through such fiscal agents, and to prescribe regulations governing the forms and procedures (which shall be uniform to the extent practicable) to be utilized in connection with such guaranties.

(d) Each guaranteeing agency is hereby authorized to use for the purposes of this section any funds which have heretofore been appropriated or allocated or which hereafter may be appropriated or allocated to it, or which are or may become available to it, for such purposes or for the purpose of meeting the necessities of the national defense.

SEC. 302. To assist in carrying out the objectives of this act, the President may make provision for loans (including participations in, or guaranties of, loans) to private business enterprises for the expansion of capacity, the development of technological processes, or the production of essential materials. Such loans may be made without regard to the limitations of existing law and on such terms and conditions as the President deems necessary, except that financial assistance may be extended only to the extent that it is not otherwise available on reasonable terms.

SEC. 303. (a) To assist in carrying out the objectives of this act, the President may make provision for purchases of or commitments to purchase metals, minerals and other raw materials, including liquid fuels, for Government use or for resale.

(b) Purchases and commitments to purchase and sales under subsection (a) may be made without regard to the limitations of existing law, for such quantities, and on such terms and conditions, including advance payments, and for such periods, as the President deems necessary, except that purchases or commitments to purchase involving higher than currently prevailing market prices or anticipated loss on resale shall not be made unless it is determined that supply of the materials could not be effectively increased at lower prices or on terms more favorable to the Government, or that such purchases are necessary to assure the availability to the United States of overseas supplies.

(c) The procurement power granted to the President by this section shall include the power to transport and store, and have processed and refined any materials procured under this section.

SEC. 304. (a) For the purposes of sections 302 and 303, the President is hereby authorized to utilize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and such other departments, agencies, officials or corporations of the Government as he may deem appropriate, or to create new corporations.

(b) Any corporation created under this section:

(1) shall have the power to sue and be sued; to acquire, hold, and dispose of property; to use its revenues; to determine the character of and necessity for its obligations and expenditures and the manner in which they shall be incurred, allowed, paid, and accounted for subject to laws specifically applicable to Government corporations, and to exercise such other powers as may be necessary or appropriate to carry out the purposes of such corporation;

(2) shall have its powers set out in a charter, which shall be published in the Federal Register, and all amendments to which shall be similarly published;

(3) shall not have succession beyond June 30, 1952, except for purposes of liquidation, unless its life is extended beyond such date pursuant to the act of Congress; and

(4) shall be subject to the Government Corporation Control Act to the same extent as wholly owned Government corporations listed in section 101 of said act.

(c) Any corporation established or utilized pursuant to this section is authorized to borrow from the Treasury of the United States, for any of the purposes of the corporation, such sums of money as may be necessary to carry out its functions under this title: Provided, That the total amount borrowed under the provisions of this section by all such corporations shall not exceed an aggregate of $2,000,000,000 outstanding at any one time. For the purpose of borrowing as authorized by this paragraph, any corporation established pursuant to this section may issue to the Secretary of the Treasury its notes, debentures, bonds, or other obligations to be redeemable at the option of the corporation before maturity in such manner as may be stipulated in such obligations. Such obligations may mature subsequent to the period of succession of the corporation. Such obligation shall bear interest at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration the current average rate on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States as of the last day of the month preceding the issuance of the obligations of the corporation. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase any obligations of any such corporation to be issued hereunder and for such purpose the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use as a public-debt transaction the proceeds from the sale of any securities issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, are extended to include any purchases of the obligations of any corporation hereunder.

TITLE IV—CONTROL OF CREDIT

Subtitle A—Consumer and real-estate credit

SEC. 401. (a) To assist in carrying out the purposes of this act, the President is authorized from time to time to prescribe regulations with respect to such kind or kinds of consumer and real-estate credit as, in his judgment, it is necessary to regulate in order to prevent or reduce excessive or untimely use of or fluctuations in such credit. Such regulations may, among other things, prescribe maximum loan or credit values, minimum down payments in cash or property, trade-in or exchange values, maximum maturities, maximum amounts of credit, rules regarding the amount, form, and time of various payments, rules against any credit in specified circumstances, rules regarding consolidations, renewals, revisions, transfers, or assignments of credit, and rules regarding other similar or related matters. Such regulations may classify persons and transactions and may apply different requirements thereto, and may include such administrative provisions as in the judgment of the President are reasonably necessary in order to effectuate the purposes of this subtitle or to prevent evasions thereof.

In prescribing and suspending such regulations, including changes from time to time to take account of changing conditions, the President shall consider among other factors, (1) the level and trend of consumer and real-estate credit and the various kinds thereof, (2) the effect of the use of such credit upon (i) purchasing power and (ii) demand for real property and improvements thereon and for other goods and services, and (3) the need in the national economy for the maintenance of sound credit conditions.

(b) No person shall extend or maintain any credit, or renew, revise, consolidate, refinance, purchase, sell, discount, or lend or borrow on, any obligation arising out of any credit, or arrange for any of the foregoing, in contravention of any regulation prescribed by the President pursuant to this section. Any person who extends or maintains any credit, or renews, revises, consolidates, refinances, purchases, sells, discounts, or lends or borrows on, any obligation arising out of any credit, or arranges for any of the foregoing, shall make, keep, and preserve for such periods, such accounts, correspondence, memoranda, papers, books, and other records, and make such reports, under oath or otherwise, as the President may by regulation require as necessary or appropriate in order to effectuate the purposes of this subtitle; and such accounts, correspondence, memoranda, papers, books, and other records shall be subject at any time or from time to time to such reasonable periodic, special, or other examinations by examiners or other representatives of the President as the President may deem necessary or appropriate. The requirements of this section apply whether a person is acting as principal, agent, broker, vendor, or otherwise.

(c) Any person who willfully violates any provision of this subtitle or any regulation or order thereunder, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than 1 year, or both.

(d) To assist in carrying out the purposes of this subtitle, the President by regulation may require transactions or persons or classes thereof subject to this subtitle to be registered or licensed; and, after notice and opportunity for hearing, the President by order may suspend any such registration or license for violation of this subtitle or any regulation prescribed by the President pursuant to this subtitle. The provisions of section 25 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, as amended, shall apply in the case of any such order of the President in the same manner that such provisions apply in the case of orders of the Securities and Exchange Commission under that act. In carrying out this subtitle, the President may act through and may utilize the services of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, the Federal Reserve banks and any other agencies, Federal or State, which are available and appropriate.

(e) For the purposes of this subtitle, unless the context otherwise requires, the following terms shall have the following meanings, but the President may in his regulations further define such terms and, in addition, may define technical, trade, and accounting terms, insofar as any such definitions are not inconsistent with the provisions of this subtitle:

(1) "Consumer credit" means credit which the obligor undertakes to pay in two or more payments, or any other credit: Provided, That it shall not include (i) any credit to finance or refinance the construction or purchase of an entire residential or nonresidential building, (ii) any credit extended to a business enterprise solely to finance the purchase of goods for resale, or (iii) any other credit extended to a business or agricultural enterprise for any business or agricultural purpose unless the credit is secured by or is for the purpose of purchasing or carrying any durable or semidurable goods which are used or usable for personal, family, or household purposes, or any accessory insurance service connected with any such good or any interest therein.

(2) "Real estate credit" means credit secured, either wholly or partly, by real property (including leasehold and other interests therein); credit for the purpose of purchasing or carrying such property or constructing buildings or otherwise improving such property; and credit involving a right to acquire or use such property.

(3) "Credit" means any loan, advance, or discount; any conditional sale contract; any contract to sell or sale or contract of sale, of property or services, either for present or subsequent delivery, under which part or all of the price is payable subsequent to the making of such sale or contract; any rental-purchase contract, or any contract for the bailment, leasing or other use of property under which the bailee, lessee, or user has the option of becoming the owner thereof, obligates himself to pay as compensation a sum substantially equivalent to or in excess of the value thereof, or has the right to have all or part of the payments required by such contract applied to the purchase price of such property or similar property; any option, demand, lien, pledge or similar claim against, or for the delivery of property or money; any purchase, discount, or other acquisition of, or any credit under the security of, any obligation or claim arising out of any of the foregoing; and any transaction or series of transactions having a similar purpose or effect.

(4) "Person," in addition to the definition given it by section 502 (a) of this act, includes the United States, any State or subdivision thereof, and any agency or instrumentality of one or more such authorities, except that the criminal penalties of this subtitle shall not be applicable to the United States, any State, or other governmental agency or instrumentality.

SEC. 402. To assist in carrying out the objectives of this act, the President may, at any time or times, notwithstanding any other provision of law, reduce, for such period as he shall specify, the maximum authorized principal amounts, ratios of loan to value or cost, or maximum maturities of any type or types of loans on real estate which thereafter may be made, insured, or guaranteed by any department, independent establishment, or agency in the executive branch of the United States, or by any wholly owned Government corporation or by any mixed-ownership Government corporation as defined in the Government Corporation Control Act, as amended, or reduce or suspend any such authorized loan program, upon a determination, after taking into consideration the effect thereof upon conditions in the building industry and upon the national economy and the needs for increased defense production, that such action is necessary in the public interest: Provided, That in the exercise of these powers, the President shall give consideration to the preservation of such relative credit preferences as are accorded to veterans of World War II under existing law.

SEC. 403. The first sentence of section 5A of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended by section 1 of the act of June 27, 1950 (Public Law 576, 81st Cong.), is amended to read as follows: "No member of a Federal home loan bank shall make or purchase any loan at any time when its cash and obligations of the United States are not equal to such amount as the Home Loan Bank Board shall by regulations prescribed: Provided, That such amount shall not be less than 4 percent or more than 20 percent of the obligation of the member or withdrawal accounts or, in the case of any member insurance company, such other base as the Board may determine to be comparable."; and the last sentence of said section 5A is amended to read as follows: "This section shall be effective upon the enactment of the Defense Production Act of 1950."

Subtitle B—Commodity speculation

SEC. 411. The Commodity Exchange Act, as amended (42 Stat. 998; 49 Stat. 1491; 52 Stat. 205; 54 Stat. 1059), is further amended by inserting at the end of section 4a the following:

"(5) (A) Whenever the President determines that the nature or extent of speculative trading on boards of trade causes or threatens to cause sudden or unreasonable fluctuations or unwarranted changes in the price of any commodity, he may prescribe rules and regulations governing the margin to be required with respect to the purchase or sale of any such commodity for future delivery, or the maintenance of a position resulting from such purchase or sale, on or subject to the rules of any board of trade, whether or not designated as a contract market under section 5 of this act.

"(B) It shall be unlawful for any person to buy or sell, or accept orders for the purchase or sale of any such commodity for future delivery, subject to the rules of any board of trade, or maintain or carry a position resulting from such purchase or sale, unless margin funds or securities are deposited and maintained in compliance with the rules and regulations promulgated under this paragraph (5). No floor broker shall be deemed to have violated this paragraph (5) with respect to any transaction in connection with which he has acted solely in the capacity of floor broker.

"(C) All money, securities, or property deposited as margin shall be handled by the person receiving such margin in compliance with the requirements of section 4d (2), regardless of whether such person is a futures commission merchant as defined in this act and, for the purpose of this provision, the term 'contract market,' as used in section 4d (2), shall be deemed to mean board of trade.

"(D) It shall be unlawful for any person to engage in soliciting or accepting orders for the purchase or sale of any commodity for future delivery on any board of trade, whether or not such board of trade is designated as a contract market, unless such person shall keep a record in writing showing the date, the parties to such contracts and their addresses, the commodity covered and its price, the terms of delivery, and the amount and kind of margin deposited. Such record shall be kept for a period of 3 years from the date of the transaction and shall at all times be open to the inspection of any representative of any agency of the United States designated for the purpose by the President.

"(E) For the purposes of subparagraph (5) the term 'commodity' shall mean, in addition to those commodities specifically mentioned in section 2 (a) of this act, any other agricultural or forest product or by-product.

"(F) For the efficient execution of the provisions of this paragraph (5), the provisions of section 21 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (48 Stat. 899), as amended, are made applicable to the jurisdiction, powers, and duties of the President in administering and enforcing the provisions of this paragraph (5) and to any person subject thereto.

"(G) Section 4a and 4i of the act are extended and made applicable to any commodity as defined in (E) above, and for the purposes of this subparagraph (5) the term 'contract market' as used in sections 4a and 4i shall be deemed to mean Board of Trade."

SEC. 412. Section 407 of the Agricultural Act of 1949 (Public Law 439, 81st Cong.) is hereby amended by adding the following sentence at the end thereof: "Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, whenever the President so directs, sales of any commodity owned or controlled by the Commodity Credit Corporation may be made at the current support price for such commodity, when such support price is not below the market price, for the purpose of stabilizing the market, including the discouragement and prevention of undue speculation, fluctuation, and enhancement in price, and for the purpose of meeting unusual demand."

TITLE V—GENERAL PROVISIONS

(b) In order to carry out this policy—

(ii) in the formation of any business advisory committees under this act, consideration shall be given to providing fair representation for small, medium, and large business enterprises, for different geographical areas, for trade association members and nonmembers, and for different segments of the industry;

(iii) in administering this act, such exemptions shall be provided for small-business enterprises as may be feasible without impeding the accomplishment of the objectives of this act; and

(iv) in administering this act, special provision shall be made for the expeditious handling of all requests, applications, or appeals from small-business enterprises.

SEC. 502. As used in this act:

(a) The word "person" shall include individuals, firms, corporations, associations, partnerships, and any organized groups of persons whether or not incorporated.

(b) The word "materials" shall include raw materials, articles, commodities, products, supplies, components, technical information, and processes.

SEC. 503. The President may delegate any power or authority conferred upon him by this act to any officer or agency of the Government and may authorize such redelegations by that officer or agency as the President may deem appropriate. Any officer or agency may employ civilian personnel for duty in the United States, including the District of Columbia, or elsewhere, without regard to section 14 of the Federal Employees Pay Act of 1946 (60 Stat. 219), as the President deems necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 504. The President may make such rules, regulations, and orders as he deems necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of this act. Any regulation or order under this act may contain such classifications and differentiations and may provide for such adjustments and reasonable exceptions as in the judgment of the President are necessary or proper in order to effectuate the purposes of this act.

SEC. 505. (a) The President shall be entitled, by regulation, subpena, or otherwise, to obtain such information from, require such reports and the keeping of such records by, make such inspection of the books, records, and other writings, premises or property of, and take the sworn testimony of, any person as may be necessary or appropriate, in his discretion, to the enforcement or the administration of this act and the regulations or orders issued thereunder. The President shall issue regulations insuring that the authority of this subsection will be utilized only after the scope and purpose of the investigation, inspection, or inquiry to be made have been defined by competent authority.

(b) No person shall be excused from attending and testifying or from producing books, papers, documents, and other evidence in obedience to a subpena before any grand jury or in any court proceeding based upon or growing out of any alleged violation of this act on the ground that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him may tend to incriminate him or subject him to penalty or forfeiture; but no natural person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture, for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he is so compelled, after having claimed his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, except that such natural person so testifying shall not be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying: Provided, That the immunity granted herein from prosecution and punishment and from any penalty or forfeiture shall not be construed to vest in any individual any right to priorities assistance, to the allocation of materials, or to any other benefit which is within the power of the President to grant under any provision of this act.

(c) The production of a person's books, records, or other documentary evidence shall not be required at any place other than the place where such person usually keeps them, if, prior to the return date specified in the regulations, subpena, or other document issued with respect thereto, such person furnishes the President with a true copy of such books, records, or other documentary evidence (certified by such person under oath to be a true and correct copy) or enters into a stipulation with the President as to the information contained in such books, records, or other documentary evidence. Witnesses shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States.

(d) Information obtained under this section which the President deems confidential or with reference to which a request for confidential treatment is made by the person furnishing such information shall not be published or disclosed unless the President determines that the withholding thereof is contrary to the interest of the national defense, and any person willfully violating this provision shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than 1 year, or both.

SEC. 506. The district courts of the United States and the United States courts of any Territory or other place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States shall have jurisdiction of violations of this act or any rule, regulation, order, or subpena thereunder, and of all civil actions under this act to enforce any liability or duty created by, or to enjoin any violation of, this act or any rule, regulation, order, or subpena thereunder. Any criminal proceeding on account of any such violation may be brought in any district in which any act, failure to act, or transaction constituting the violation occurred. Any such civil action may be brought in any such district or in the district in which the defendant resides or transacts business. Process in such cases, criminal or civil, may be served in any district wherein the defendant resides or transacts business or wherever the defendant may be found; the subpena for witnesses who are required to attend a court in any district in such case may run into any other district. The termination of the authority granted in any title or section of this act, or of any rule, regulation, or order issued thereunder, shall not operate to defeat any suit, action, or prosecution, whether theretofore or thereafter commenced, with respect to any right, liability or offense incurred or committed prior to the termination date of such title or of such rule, regulation, or order. No costs shall be assessed against the United States in any proceeding under this act.

SEC. 507. No person shall be held liable for damages or penalties for any act or failure to act resulting directly or indirectly from his compliance with a rule, regulation, or order issued pursuant to title II of this act, notwithstanding that any such rule, regulation, or order shall thereafter be declared by judicial or other competent authority to be invalid. No person shall discriminate against orders or contracts to which priority is assigned or for which materials or facilities are allocated under title II of this act or under any rule, regulation, or order issued thereunder, by charging higher prices or by imposing different terms and conditions for such orders or contracts than for other generally comparable orders or contracts, or in any other manner.

SEC. 508. (a) No act or omission to act requested by the President, and found by him to be in the public interest as contributing to the national defense, shall be construed to be within the prohibitions of the antitrust laws or the Federal Trade Commission Act of the United States. A copy of each such request intended to be within the coverage of this section, and any modification or withdrawal thereof, shall be furnished to the Attorney General when made, and it shall be published in the Federal Register unless publication thereof would, in the opinion of the President, endanger the national security.

(b) The authority granted in subsection (a) shall not be delegated except to a single official of the Government and then only upon the condition that such official consult with the Attorney General not less than 10 days before making any request or finding thereunder.

(c) Upon withdrawal of any request or finding made hereunder the provisions of this section shall not apply to any subsequent act or omission to act by reason of such finding or request.

SEC. 509. The functions exercised under this act shall be excluded from the operation of the Administrative Procedure Act (60 Stat. 237) except as to the requirements of section 3 thereof.

SEC. 510. The President, to the extent he deems it necessary and appropriate in order to carry out the provisions of this act, is authorized to place positions and employ persons in grades 16, 17 and 18 of the general schedule established by the Classification Act of 1949, and such positions shall be additional to the number authorized by section 505 of that act.

SEC. 511. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary and appropriate for the carrying out of the provisions and purposes of this act by the President and such agencies as he may designate or create. Funds made available for the purposes of this act may be allocated or transferred for any of the purposes of this act, with the approval of the Bureau of the Budget, to any agency designated to assist in carrying out this act. Funds so allocated or transferred shall remain available for such period as may be specified in the acts making such funds available.

SEC. 512. This act and all authority conferred hereunder shall terminate June 30, 1952, or until such earlier time as the Congress by concurrent resolution or the President may designate.

The statement prepared by Mr. MAYBANK is as follows:

I have introduced, by request, a bill entitled "The Defense Production Act of 1950." This is the administration's draft of proposed legislation which is intended to carry out the requests and recommendations contained in the President's message to the Congress.

Hearings on the proposed legislation will be held by the Banking and Currency Committee beginning at 10:30 a. m. on Monday, July 24. The first witness will be Hon. Stuart W. Symington, Chairman of the National Security Resources Board. The Chairman's testimony will be followed on Tuesday by that of General Bradley and Secretary of Commerce Charles Sawyer.

It is my desire, as chairman of the committee which will hold the hearings, to bring to light such information as is available in order that the American people may be sufficiently informed as to the need for whatever legislation may be finally enacted.

As an individual Senator, it will not be my purpose to approve of any broad and unrestricted authority which might return our people to any system of rationing and price controls until such a move is absolutely necessary beyond any shadow of a doubt.

It is my hope that the manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers of the Nation will not take advantage of the present crisis through unscrupulous and unwarranted increases in their prices.

I also urge the American people to proceed in an intelligent manner in their daily purchases of commodities and manufactured products. Such scare buying and hoarding of these items as are being reported to me daily will leave the Congress no choice other than to impose compulsory rationing and price controls.

The proposed bill has been examined most carefully with regard to committee jurisdiction. It has been clearly determined that, with the exception of the amendments to the Commodity Credit Act and the Agriculture Adjustment Act, the proposed legislation is clearly within the jurisdiction of the Banking and Currency Committee. I have announced that I shall confer with the Senate Agriculture Committee before any final action is taken on the proposals which fall within the scope of that committee's jurisdiction. These actions have been taken, and arrangements for hearings have been discussed with, and fully concurred in, by Senator TOBEY, the ranking minority member of the Banking and Currency Committee.

The hearings before the Banking and Currency Committee will be complete. I sincerely trust that the American people will carefully follow these hearings in order that they may be wholly informed of such needs as those which we presently face in this national crisis.

During this time of suspense and expectation I am confident that our people will give their fullest support and cooperation to the boys who are fighting and dying in their all-out effort to preserve the liberties of free people. The efforts of our fighting men can be no better than the support they get from behind the lines. Here in this country we are far behind the lines today. Were it not for the skill and bravery of our servicemen and a mounting flow of equipment and matériel from our production lines, our main streets might well be the front lines of tomorrow.

The President's message which was delivered to the Congress today gave full notice of the gravity of the present crisis. It was an excellent report to the Congress, and I commend his review which he will transmit to the American people in person tonight.

The primary obligation of the American civilian is to contribute to the welfare of the American soldier.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I wish to state that I had called a meeting of the members of the Committee on Banking and Currency for Thursday and Friday to hear Secretary Sawyer and others discuss the current price and production situation. Inasmuch, however, as the bill I have just introduced will be before the committee and is of paramount interest, I have decided, after conferring with the executive branch of the Government, to begin the hearing on the production bill of 1950 on Monday, July 24, with the Chairman of the National Security Resources Board, W. Stuart Symington, General Bradley, and Secretary Sawyer present.

EXTENSION OF ENLISTMENTS IN THE ARMED FORCES

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Maryland wishes to be recognized, the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thought the Senator from Arizona had the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not so understand. The Chair has not recognized the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. TYDINGS. I ask for recognition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Arizona, but at this time recognizes the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may introduce a bill to authorize the President to extend enlistments in the Armed Forces of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 3937) to authorize the President to extend enlistments in the Armed Forces of the United States, introduced by Mr. TYDINGS, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

STATEHOOD FOR ALASKA AND HAWAII—RESOLUTION OF MERRILL (WIS.) CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Mulvihill, executive secretary of the Merrill, Wis., Chamber of Commerce, on the subject of the statehood bills for Hawaii and Alaska.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MERRILL CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Merrill, Wis., July 11, 1950.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY:

Whereas certain world conditions have focused attention on the boundaries of our country; and

Whereas situations have arisen that provoke immediate concern: Be it

STATEHOOD FOR HAWAII—RESOLUTION OF CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF HAWAII OF 1950, AND EDITORIAL

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I have received from the Secretary of the Constitutional Convention of the Territory of Hawaii a resolution adopted by that convention urging the enactment of H. R. 49, the statehood bill. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be appropriately referred, and printed in the body of the RECORD together with an editorial from the Washington Post of this morning entitled "Statehood Now."

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table, and, with the editorial, to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The resolution is as follows:

Whereas H. R. 49, of the Eighty-first Congress of the United States, entitled "An act to enable the people of Hawaii to form a constitution and State government and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," has passed the House of Representatives; and

Whereas said bill has been favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and is now on the Senate Calendar; and

Whereas favorable action by the House and by the Senate committee demonstrates that both of these bodies deem that Hawaii has met the requisite qualifications for statehood; and

Whereas the people of Hawaii have shown by every possible means their ardent desire to become a State, and to help achieve that goal have elected this constitutional convention; and

Whereas this constitutional convention has completed its work of drafting a constitution for the State of Hawaii, meeting the appropriate requirements of H. R. 49: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Constitutional Convention of Hawaii of 1950, That the Senate of the United States be urgently requested to take up the question of statehood for Hawaii before adjournment of the present session of Congress and to act favorably on H. R. 49; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States; the President of the Senate; Senator SCOTT W. LUCAS, majority leader of the Senate; Senator JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, chairman of the Committee on Interior and Insular Aaffirs; Senator ROBERT A. TAFT; Senator KENNETH S. WHERRY, minority leader of the Senate; the Secretary of the Interior; and to Delegate JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Washington (D. C.) Post of July 19, 1950]

STATEHOOD NOW

If there was ever a time when the United States needed to set an example to the world of its treatment of dependent areas under its control, this is it. The Korean conflict, far from lessening the importance of statehood for Hawaii and Alaska, actually increases it. This voluntary step would have great psychological effect in anticolonial countries such as India and Indonesia. And, as Defense Secretary Johnson has stated, strong elected local governments in Hawaii and Alaska would be important in the case of attack. "Statehood for Alaska and Hawaii," he writes, "would undoubtedly give a considerable added measure of strength to the over-all defense of both areas in event of an emergency."

Fortunately the statehood bills, both of which have passed the House, are high on the administration's agenda and there is good prospect that they will be brought up in the Senate shortly. For this Alaska and Hawaii have cause to be grateful to Senator O'MAHONEY and the Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee which he heads. The committee has issued thorough and convincing reports on both bills which effectively dispose of the arguments against statehood. Both Territories, the reports show, are steeped in the traditions of Americanism and self-government, have voted for statehood, and are financially able to assume the responsibilities of membership in the Union.

In the case of Hawaii, the report debunks the charge of communism, citing repeated investigations and figures showing that there never have been more than 160 Communists in the islands; Communist influence has waned through alertness on the part of the people. The argument of noncontiguity, which applies to Alaska, too, is answered by the fact that both Territories are far closer in terms of air time today than many present States were even 50 years ago. As to the effect of the large non-Caucasian population of Hawaii, the report has merely to cite the magnificent combat record of Hawaiian units in World War II.

Alaska's population has usually been her most vulnerable point. However, this today is estimated at 135,000—nearly the same as Nevada's—and is increasing rapidly. The report emphasizes that full economic development and realization of Alaska's tremendous potential are not possible without statehood. Under the bill Alaska would derive much more benefit from her own rich resources. The eyes, not only of these Territories, but also a large part of the world, will be on the Senate. It ought not to hesitate in strengthening the Union with these Pacific bastions of Americanism.

IMPORT TARIFF ON DAIRY PRODUCTS—RESOLUTION OF PINE ROCK GRANGE, NO. 775, PINE CITY, MINN.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Pine Rock Grange, No. 775 of Pine City, Minn., expressing their opposition to the lowering of the import tariff on dairy products.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas there is to be an International Trade Conference, to be held in Torquay, England, in September of this year, at which 10 delegates from 17 countries will meet to discuss reducing reciprocal tariff rates; and

Whereas the price of dairy products has already been reduced about 30 percent in the last 2 years and

Whereas the tax on oleomargarine has been removed; and

Whereas, already, many foreign countries, because of the high value of the American dollar, are shipping all their dairy products to this country; and

Whereas the same countries which are flooding our markets with their dairy products, are for their own domestic use, importing oleomargarine from the southern countries;

Therefore we, the members of the Pine Rock Grange, ask you to contact the delegates, who will represent the United States at this meeting, and urge them to oppose the lowering of tariffs on dairy products shipped to this country.

MILTON HAUG,
Master.
MRS. ADDIE LUNDIN,
Secretary.

GENERAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1951

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7786) making appropriations for the support of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I suggest that the clerk continue to read the bill for amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was on page 246, line 5, under the heading "General investigations," to strike out "$5,150,000" and to insert "$6,500,000."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The Senate will be in order. Those who are compelled to leave the galleries will do so quietly.

Mr. DOUGLAS rose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois desire recognition on the amendment?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. May I inquire what page of the bill we are considering?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Page 246, line 5.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, because of the degree of noise in the Chamber, I do not believe many Senators heard the clerk when he read the committee amendment, and I wondered if we could not now proceed to the consideration of that amendment, instead of treating it as having been agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair anounced that without objection the amendment was agreed to. If the Senator wishes recognition on the amendment, the Chair will withdraw the announcement. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, the bill as passed by the House appropriated $5,150,000 for general investigations and planning on the part of the Bureau of Reclamation. I may point out that according to the Senate hearings, on page 541, the Bureau of Reclamation has already a substantial carry-over from previous appropriations for this purpose. This amount was stated as approximately a million dollars, although it may be that later testimony indicated that there might be some downward adjustment in that figure.

Furthermore, the Missouri Basin appropriations for the Bureau include about three and one-half millions dollars for planning, as is seen on page 149 of the Senate committee report. It is labeled "phase C." The Bureau therefore already has about a million dollars, so far as we can tell, and if the Missouri Basin appropriations are agreed to, there will be a further $3,500,000. The Senate committee has now increased the House appropriation from $5,150,000 to $6,500,000, or an increase of $1,350,000.

Mr. President, we have just heard read a message from the President of the United States asking an appropriation of $10,000,000,000 for military purposes. This in itself would be extremely serious, but we know it will be followed, in all probability, by additional requests for appropriations. Yet here we are apparently going on with business as usual, carrying out elaborate and increasing investigations for further reclamation and power projects which we know in our hearts, if we are to carry out the duty imposed upon us, will be postponed or not put into effect.

Mr. President, I think that as we are considering measures to adjust the civilian economy of the country to the new tasks imposed by the military situation we should gear our own actions now to accomplish the same result, and this is a pretty good place to begin. Here is where we can save $1,350,000 to begin with.

These plans are merely the beginning. First, provision is made for planning; then come authorizations; and then come appropriations. So we are starting upstream on a series of gigantic projects to help the engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation spend not merely millions of dollars, but literally billions of dollars, on the projects they already have on the drawing boards. And they want to get the drawing boards ready for still further projects.

Mr. President, I hope very much that the Senate will reconsider its action, which was taken in great haste, and that it will sustain the House figure of $5,150,000.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I take it from what the Senator has just said that he believes that in the past we have made a great mistake by developing reclamation and hydroelectric projects. The Senator may remember that it was the Reclamation Service that built the Grand Coulee Dam. If we had not had the plans for it it could not have been built. The Senator knows that most of the money, when actually expended, goes into hydroelectric projects.

The Senator from Illinois will further remember that in the days of the depression we did not have any such plans, and because of the lack of plans there arose the necessity for WPA. So we spent more money on inconsequential projects, and added nothing much to the life of the Nation, simply because of the lack of information. The Budget Bureau's estimate, recommended by the President of the United States, is $7,800,000. The committee has not allowed that much, but has cut it more than $1,000,000. We always have difficulty with these appropriations because of misunderstandings respecting them.

First, I should like to have the Senator to know that $500,000 of this money is not taxpayers' money at all. It comes from the money collected from the Boulder Canyon project and is expendable in that Colorado River area. The remainder of the money, all except some $200,000, is reimbursable. That is, it is not going to be an ultimate loss to the Treasury of the United States.

I cannot understand how at any stage of the proceedings any person can determine that we should not have plans so that we may know what we are doing. Without plans we will simply be working in the dark, and all of a sudden, when the demand comes, we will have to take quick action, and, as a result, make many mistakes. My judgment is that the appropriation is a sound one and in a proper amount, and that the Senate should allow it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I point out that the budget estimates were prepared in December 1949, and were submitted to the Congress on the 3d of January 1950. They are, therefore, at least 7 months behind time, and in the past 7 months many things have happened, particularly in the 3½ weeks since the North Koreans went south of the thirty-eighth parallel. What we are having now is widespread police action in South Korea, and the President has just asked for $10,000,000,000.

I say to my colleagues that if we have to appropriate $10,000,000,000 to drive the North Koreans back and to prepare our defenses for other points—and I am perfectly ready to do it, and the country is ready to do it—it is time that we trimmed ordinary civilian expenditures, and I submit that here is a very good place to trim.

We are already appropriating large sums for planning. Last year we appropriated, as I remember, $100,000,000 for plans to be drawn in the event a depression should occur. We have made large authorizations in various parts of the budget for planning. According to a chart in the hearings, we already have nearly $1,000,000 carried over from last year. Then there are the Missouri Basin planning appropriations of three and one-half million dollars. I do not propose that planning be cut out entirely. I think we ought to reduce it to a minimum in view of the national emergency.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator from Illinois should be consistent. He should move to cut the amount much below what the House allowed in this case.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am perfectly willing to make such a motion.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator from Illinois should be consistent; he should do that all the way through the bill. I may remind him that at the beginning of the last war when I had charge of the Interior Department appropriation bill, it looked like we were going to get into war. I said I wanted the Senate to understand and the country to understand that the appropriations in that bill were all subject to review in case the money was needed elsewhere. The President did impound the money, and, if necessary, the President will do the same thing again.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Why should we depend on Executive action? Why do we not have power of independent judgment in this matter?

Mr. HAYDEN. Because we are acting today. The President can act tomórrow and the next day as the occasion requires.

Mr. DOUGLAS. We know that there is a full-scale war in South Korea. We know that we are going to spend $10,000,000,000 at a minimum. We know, in view of that situation, that we should curtail on civilian expenditures. Here is an item for future planning for public works which in all probability will not be carried out for years, if at all.

Why is not this a chance to show the country that we want to make some savings? Why should we always make appropriations and then depend on the President to take the rap in making the cut?

Mr. HAYDEN. If it is a question of making a showing, that is one thing. If it is a question of doing a sane piece of business, to undertake proper planning, that is another thing. I insist that the appropriation should not be reduced.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I rise only in the hope that I can clear up for the RECORD a false impression which may have been created by the colloquy relating to planning developments, particularly for power. When anyone suggests that in any all-out war effort power is not just as important as a tank, a gun, or an airplane, he is under a misapprehension. The Senator from Arizona, the chairman of the subcommittee, pointed out that had it not been for the great power dams on the Columbia River and in the Tennessee Valley, World War II probably would have lasted many, many months longer than it did. Had it not been for the hydroelectric power projects which were begun back in the 1930's, over the opposition of many Members of Congress, who said we should not plan these things—but, nevertheless, Franklin D. Roosevelt and the administration went ahead with the work and started the construction—had it not been for the power resulting from that construction we would be 10 years behind in atomic development.

Mr. President, I hope that when we in Congress in the future or during the present emergency discuss the question of whether we shall limit, as we should, expenditures for nonessential purposes, that is production for purely domestic needs as compared with military needs, we will, in the light of experience, place the development of hydroelectric power in the category of a purely military item.

The President even today in his message, when he pointed out what we must spend for this war, and for what may happen, makes the situation clear. I quote from his message:

> Nevertheless, the increased appropriations for the Department of Defense, plus the defense-related appropriations which I have recently submitted for power development and atomic energy, and others which will be necessary for such purposes as stockpiling—

And so on, and so forth. In other words, he urges that the amount of money we have to spend in this emergency should not affect in any way our planning for power, reclamation, and the internal development of our country.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield the floor.

Mr. MURRAY. Is it not also a fact that at the present moment there is a shortage of hydroelectric power in various parts of the country, and that if that shortage continues during the effort to rearm it will be very difficult to carry on the program?

Mr. MAGNUSON. Yes. The President points out in his message of today that it is not only the Korean matter that should be considered, but that it looks like a long-time operation in order to stamp out the ideologies of communism in the world. That may last for a long time. During that time we must keep our armament up to the point where it is sufficient to do the job for ourselves and the United Nations. Part of what is necessary to do the job is power. For instance, one-half of all our aluminum, which is most vital in any modern warfare, in the building of airplanes, and for other purposes, must be developed by power. Without Grand Coulee it would be impossible to have the atomic energy plant at Hanford. Without Grand Coulee we could not produce one-fifth of the aluminum we are now producing; and without Bonneville, we could not produce the power which is needed there. Two more pot lines are being installed at the aluminum plant, Mr. President.

So if we begin to reduce expenditures, I hope we do not cut out the real heart of our production, which is cheap hydroelectric power.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I dislike very much to enter this discussion, but I cannot remain silent under the circumstances. I wish to relate a little of American history with which all Members of the Senate are familiar.

During the debate on the strategic materials bill, a bill introduced in Congress many years ago, a great Senator, who became a vital leader in the war effort, made a strong plea for economy. He was opposed to entering upon a great program of stockpiling, and he asked the Senate not to do the things which I had said would be essential if we got into war. I had stated that America was in a perilous condition. The Senator who opposed me prevailed, however, with the result that on the floor of the Senate a bill providing for a $125,000,000 expenditure for the beginning of our stockpiling program was reduced to $25,000,000 That step was taken by the Senate because Senators were economy-minded.

However, when the bill went to conference, the conferees on the part of the House were adamant; and the final result was that the full amount was provided. That bill was enacted and went on the statute books in time of peace.

It was most important to have that bill enacted into law and to have that program available, for the minute Hitler moved into Poland—and this is history which has not been related very often—the Russian organizations in the United States started to purchase our rubber. Rubber jumped 300 percent in price in one day, and it looked as if all the available rubber on our market would become controlled by a foreign government.

At that time there was in operation in the world a consortium for the control of rubber. It had a representative in New York, representing the governments of Great Britain, Holland, and France. That representative came to Washington and told me what was happening. There was nothing which could be done under the law to meet the necessities of that situation; but immediately following a call to the White House, we promised that in the first military bill which came before the Senate there would be included an embargo on the exportation of rubber. The result was that the price of rubber was brought down. However, what we were most concerned with was to have available an adequate supply of rubber. Therefore, before the embargo was imposed, I secured a promise that the rubber quota for the United States would be doubled for that year and would be tripled for the next year, and that all the rubber then at our disposal would be shipped at once to the United States. Mr. President, this is the part of the story which I wish to emphasize for the benefit of the Senate and the people of the United States: If on December 7, 1941, the Japanese had been able to capture that rubber when it was on the high seas, in shipment to the United States, they would have crippled the United States Government far more than they were able to do by the destruction of most of our fleet at Pearl Harbor.

Mr. President, in order to maintain the strength of our country, we must not rely solely on the military or on our manufacturers. Of course, agriculture, reclamation, and power, are most important; but we cannot have adequate strength unless we maintain sufficient long-range programs. All the people of the United States benefit, either directly or indirectly, from such programs. If those programs are curtailed, our economy suffers; attacks on such programs are attacks at the very heart and soul of the economy of the United States. Curtailments in such programs reduce the strength of our soldiers in the field.

Only yesterday the comment was made that the war now going on in Korea is the silliest war ever waged, because our men armed with rifles are being sent to repel heavy tanks. Of course, such a situation seems preposterous. It comes about because of a lack of planning and a lack of understanding.

Mr. President, I am not criticizing anyone in this connection, but in considering what action the Congress should take, at least let us realize that if we attempt to save a dollar or two in connection with these long-range programs, we are likely at the same time to destroy our strength which has been built up as a result of the expenditure of millions and millions of dollars. If that happens our whole defense effort and all that we are trying to do in the world will fail, and at the same time the American economy will collapse. After all, what more does any enemy of the United States want than to have our economy collapse?

Mr. President, upon what does the strength of the West depend except on its ordinary economy, which has been developed as a result of reclamation and the electric energy produced in connection therewith. From those developments we obtain food, power, water, all the resources of the entire west. The only strategic steel plant ever built in the history of the Nation is directly dependent upon water and water power developed at one of the reclamation projects, a project built long before the war.

Mr. President, these things are serious. We must be sure that the all-around strength of the United States is maintained, or else the United States will never succeed.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). The Senator from Wyoming is recognized.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, if it were not for the aspect of public power which is involved in this committee amendment, I should be very much impressed by what the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] has said. But we cannot afford to think of business as usual or Government as usual in the face of the present crisis. The fact remains that if it had not been for public power in the Northwest, in the Tennessee Valley, and wherever else the funds of the United States have been invested in the construction of power plants, it would have been utterly impossible for this country to have produced the munitions of war which were so necessary during the conflict in which the shooting ended in 1945—a conflict which, however, has not yet terminated.

It is utterly futile to think that private capital will go into the building of hydroelectric power plants at this time. The facts before the committee are clear: There is a far greater demand now for hydroelectric power than can be served by both private power plants and public power plants. The President advised us today that he will ask increased funds for military preparedness. If we are to expend those funds for that purpose we shall require a great deal more electric power energy than we now have.

Moreover, Mr. President, in the areas for which these plans are devised there are great natural resources, the development of which is absolutely essential. Let me speak of one—and I should like to have the attention of my friend from Illinois to this matter. Alumina, the material from which aluminum is made, is presently being manufactured chiefly from bauxite which is imported into the United States. There are all over the West, alumina clays from which alumina can be made, and as the result of the development of which the United States will be independent of foreign sources of supply of bauxite. These alumina clays cannot be developed in the West without additional electric power. We had an example during World War II of how these developments could be brought about. As a result of the Grand Coulee project, as has been indicated by the Senator from Washington, it was possible to establish in the Northwest the manufacture of aluminum, which would have been utterly impossible without that public power.

As I have said, Mr. President, under ordinary circumstances, if it were not for this matter of public power, I should be very much inclined to go along with the Senator from Illinois. We must have economy. We must not follow business as usual. We must concentrate upon building up our economy. It cannot be denied that public power is one of the essential ingredients of the sort of military preparedness which we are now about to engage upon in a more intensified degree than heretofore.

I have advised the Senator from Arizona that it is my purpose later in the consideration of this measure to offer an amendment similar to that which I presented at the time the flood-control bill was under consideration, so that, following the recommendation of the Hoover Commission, there may be set up in the executive office a board of engineers whose duty it will be to examine every one of the projects contained in this bill, so far as reclamation is concerned, and every project which is contained under the civil functions chapter of the bill, so that no new project may be initiated unless a certification is received from the engineers that the initiation of the project would help the national defense. In other words, instead of saying we shall not investigate, let us go along with investigations, so that we may know where public power projects can be developed, or even reclamation, if necessary; but let us be certain that in this emergency the funds shall not be expended to initiate projects which would be open to the criticism that they constituted only business as usual.

In those circumstances, Mr. President, and in the light of the suggestion which I make with respect to such an over-all amendment to curtail expenditures which cannot be geared into the national defense, I hope that this committee amendment may be accepted.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, by the comments of various Senators, one would have thought that my proposal to diminish the appropriation for planning further projects in the field of reclamation was of direct aid to the soldiers of North Korea, and as though the fate of the American troops in South Korea depended upon lavish planning of public works in the West. I think up reflection Senators will conclude that this is a very grievous overstatement of the situation.

I think I have been known as quite sympathetic to public-power projects. I favor public-power projects on rivers and in river basins where there is a sharp fall of rain, where the rivers have rather precipitous fall and, therefore, have rather great potentialities of power development, and where the surrounding hills are of such height that it is possible to get depth in the reservoirs without flooding much adjacent meadowland. I have always been a supporter of the TVA, and I am a supporter of public-power projects in the Columbia Valley. I hope we develop more projects in the Snake River, and so forth. But there is a time and a place for everything.

At present we are in a virtual war. We also need to remember that we have a very large backlog of existing projects for which the plans have virtually been drawn. I hold in my hand part 4 of the hearings before the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Interior, of our sister branch, the House. On page 662 there is a list of the reclamation projects in this bill which have already been authorized and approved. Incidentally, the initial cost of those projects was estimated at $1,682,000,000—no small figure. But their present estimated cost is $5,252,000,000. I ask unanimous consent that there be inserted in the RECORD at this point in my remarks the full table showing these figures in columns (2) and (3), the foregoing totals of which I have myself supplied.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, $5,250,000,000 worth of reclamation projects have already been authorized, and the general plans for them are virtually drawn.

As a matter of fact, of the $6,500,000 in this item of the bill, only a little more than $1,000,000 is for advance planning upon these authorized projects. Something like $5,048,000 goes under the general term "engineering and economic investigations." I cannot believe that the total of $6,500,000 is so essential to the war effort, so necessary to developing public power projects and getting aluminum, that we must approve it to the last jot and tittle. There probably are certain projects in the West which should be carried through. They are in general quite well under way now, and all that is needed is further work upon them.

But, Mr. President, I do not see the advantage of appropriating the full $5,000,000 more so that we can develop an additional set of plans, over and above the $5,250,000,000 worth of projects that we have authorized.

The Bureau of Reclamation moves by stages. Planning is the first stage, then authorization, and then appropriation. It has $5,250,000,000 worth of work in projects we have authorized, and it is coming before the Congress and asking to have appropriated $300,000,000 of it. It now wants to capture further territory with $5,000,000 of planning and investigation funds so it can increase its backlog of authorized projects to possibly $6,000,000,000 or $7,000,000,000. We have enough fat of potential public works to live upon for a time, and we can cut down economic investigations and the development of new projects and carry on the projects we already have under way.

Therefore, Mr. President, I move to strike out the figure "$6,500,000" and insert in its stead "$3,000,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next committee amendment.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Construction and rehabilitation," on page 247, line 2, after the word "facilities", to insert "and emergency reconstruction of the La Prele unit, Wyoming."

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I have an amendment to the committee amendment which probably should have been submitted before action on the committee amendment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment is now pending.

Mr. MAGNUSON. My amendment is at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 247, line 3, after the word "Wyoming", it is proposed to insert the following: "and initiation of construction on the Kennewick division of the Yakima project, Washington."

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I do not want to burden the Senate, and I therefore ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an explanation which I have prepared.

There being no objection, the explanation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMPELLING REASONS FOR PROVIDING FUNDS TO INITIATE CONSTRUCTION ON KENNEWICK DIVISION, YAKIMA PROJECT—STATEMENT BY SENATOR MAGNUSON

I have at the desk an amendment to provide funds to initiate construction in fiscal 1951 on the Kennewick division of the so-called Yakima project. This is a multiple-purpose project in the State of Washington.

The Kennewick division is located directly above the junction of the Yakima and the Columbia Rivers. It will service approximately 21,000 acres of land. It includes a power plant of 12,000 kilowatts. Hydroelectric power from this plant will go into the Northwest power pool.

The Bureau of the Budget recommended $175,000 for continuation of plans and specifications on the project. No construction funds were authorized by the Bureau on the mistaken theory that the Kennewick division constitutes a so-called new start.

I appeared before both House and Senate Appropriations Committees to take issue with the Budget Bureau's contention that the Kennewick is a "new start."

After weighing the facts, both committees concluded that this is merely a division of the Yakima project—a project, parts of which have been in operation over 40 years. I will not repeat my arguments here. I do wish, however, to quote the conclusion reached by the two committees.

On page 172 of its report, the House Appropriations Committee makes the following statement:

"The President's budget message on page M-65 contains the following statement:

" 'The activities of the Bureau of Reclamation and the flood-control program of the Corps of Engineers, involving the construction of dams, power facilities, canals, channels, and levees will be limited in 1951 to continuation of work on projects started in prior years.'

"The committee does not agree with the determination of the Bureau of the Budget in rejecting appropriations for the construction of the Kennewick division, Yakima project, Washington, under this expression of policy. The committee has considered this division and has determined that it is not a new project but is part of the Yakima project under such policy."

On page 146 of the Senate committee's report there appears the following:

"YAKIMA PROJECT, KENNEWICK DIVISION, WASHINGTON

"The committee concurs with the determination of the House Appropriations Committee on page 172 of its report No. 1797 to the effect that the Kennewick division of the Yakima project 'is not a new project but is a part of the Yakima project.'"

It is unmistakably clear from the language I have just quoted that both committees of Congress agree that the Kennewick division is not a new start, and there is strong implication in both statements that the Bureau of the Budget was in error in denying construction funds on that basis.

Early completion of this project is of vital importance to what is called the tricity area of eastern Washington. The tricity area includes the great atomic energy plant at Hanford.

Prior to the location of the Hanford plant in this section of eastern Washington, the economy was geared to agricultural production—packing and processing of farm produce.

In acquiring land for Hanford activities, the Atomic Energy Commission took by condemnation over 7,000 acres of rich, irrigated land. In addition, about 150,000 acres of the most desirable land in the entire Columbia Basin project have been placed in a safety zone.

Development of the atomic energy plant has brought with it a vast increase in population. To sustain this population more jobs, more produce, more of everything is required.

An area geared to agricultural production of necessity incurs heavy investments in packing sheds, processing plants, coal storage facilities, etc. Heavy withdrawal of land which formerly grew the products to sustain these investments has a depressing effect upon their value and in the long run would demand drastic readjustments. Early completion of the Kennewick division—bringing into production 21,000 acres of land—will go far toward minimizing the effect of the readjustment.

I repeat, both committees of Congress have considered carefully our contention that the Kennewick is not a new project, but one of the five divisions of the Yakima project—a division planned almost 40 years ago.

They specifically state in their reports that this is not a new start. My amendment does not increase the over-all appropriation allotted the Bureau of Reclamation for construction and rehabilitation. It simply makes it clear beyond any possible misunderstanding that if the Bureau can find the funds within its over-all appropriation it is free to initiate construction on the Kennewick division of the Yakima project.

I hope the Senate will adopt this amendment.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, the Kennewick project, in the State of Washington, lies on the slope of the Columbia River across the river from the atomic-energy plant at Hanford. When the Yakima project was planned—again getting back to planning—sufficient acreage was included to take care of what would be the normal population increase. But along came the atomic-energy plant, which took some 21,000 acres of tillable land in that area. The people there feel that the Yakima project, which is included in what we call a section of it, the Kennewick project, could be developed on the other side of the river in lieu of the 21,000 acres taken by the atomic-energy plant.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Kennewick project was not considered to be a new project. We wanted to make certain in the text of the bill that it was a part of the Yakima project.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Yes.

Mr. HAYDEN. Under those circumstances, Mr. President, I have no objection to taking the amendment to conference.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I thank the Senator from Arizona.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

GENERAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1951

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7786) making appropriations for the support of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next committee amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 247, in line 4, after the word "expended", to strike out "$297,467,000" and insert "$294,713,000."

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, we now come to the heart of the coconut. This is a general appropriation of approximately $295,000,000 to the Bureau of Reclamation for construction and rehabilitation.

I believe the appropriation bill introduces an innovation at this time in that it does not list the projects upon which the money is to be expended, but they are given in the committee report on pages 142 and 143, and I would suggest that Members of the Senate who are interested in the question consult the report at that point.

Mr. President, if this appropriation is agreed to we shall be appropriating virtually $295,000,000 for reclamation projects in the West.

NEW, OR SUBSTANTIALLY NEW, STARTS

We have gone to some trouble to find out with reference to those projects which ones constitute new starts, according to the figures which we can get, and the projects which are virtually new starts, namely, where only a small fraction of the total appropriation has already been expended. It may be assumed in such cases that only planning money has been spent thus far. I should like to give that list, if I may.

For instance, in the Central Valley, in the case of the Sly Park Dam, as to which there is a total estimated cost of $6,220,000, we find that no money has been expended to date, so that any appropriation would, in effect, constitute a fresh start.

In the case of the Folsom power facility, the total estimated cost is $47,800,000, and no money has been expended to date.

In the case of the Fort Peck project, Glendive-Williston transmission line, the total estimated cost is $2,000,000, and nothing has been spent to date according to the hearings.

Mr. President, we are thus appropriating for projects which have not been started at all, and we are also appropriating large sums of money for projects upon which only small amounts have been expended.

Let us consider parts of the so-called Gila project, for the Wellton Canal, the total estimated cost is $1,570,000. It was estimated by the Bureau that there would be expended through the fiscal year 1950, $15,291, or only 1 percent of the total.

On the Wellton lateral unit, the total estimated cost of which is $2,358,000, only $25,537 or a little over 1 percent was estimated to be expended by June 30, 1950.

On the Dome lateral unit the total estimated cost is $1,919,000, and the amount spent to June 30, 1950, was estimated as $7,516, or one-third of 1 percent. This can be checked in the House hearings.

Similarly, on the Colorado River front project, the total estimated cost of the levee system is $16,295,000, and the estimated amount spent is $414,428. The Bureau's justification stated that a preliminary report on levee plans had to be completed before construction could be initiated—House hearings, page 681.

On the Colorado-Big Thompson project, for the Brush substation, the total estimated cost is $2,513,500, of which $431,795 has been spent.

On the Flatiron, Fort Collins, Creely tap line, the total estimated cost of which is $799,100, $28,758 has been spent. The Bureau's justification states that with these requested 1951 appropriations construction on these items will be started.

On the Spring Creek Dam in the Paonia project, the total estimated cost of which is $3,300,500, the sum of $272,200 has been spent. Again the justification reveals that this appropriation will start the construction.

In the case of the Big Sandy Dam and Reservoir in the Eden project, the estimated cost is $2,000,000, and the amount estimated to be spent by June 30, 1950, is $42,025. This project was stopped by order of the War Production Board in 1942. This bill will let the construction go ahead.

On the Kendrick project, Seminole-Baroil line, the estimated cost of which is $242,000, the sum of $25,000 has been spent. This bill will let construction be initiated.

In the Missouri River Basin, the Jamestown unit, the estimated cost of which is $10,749,000, the estimated amount spent by the end of fiscal 1950 is $214,573. Our own Senate committee report, page 150, states that this appropriation will allow construction to start.

On the Missouri-Souris project and I shall have more to say about that project, because it will probably be said that it is essential to the prosecution of the war in Korea, judging by what has happened today—only $1,218,000 is estimated to have been spent, although the ultimate cost will be $68,855,000.

Mr. President, there are projects here totaling appropriations of $6,593,000. If they are new or substantially new starts, according to my figures, it is also interesting to note that the total estimated cost of the foregoing projects for which we shall be asked to make increased appropriations in the next few years, is $166,404,100.

If we make the starts this year and carry on this year, it will be said, "Well, we have gone so far. We must continue." Then we shall be involved in a further appropriation of approximately $160,000,000. I think this is a very crucial time for us to stop, look, and listen on this kind of appropriation.

MISSOURI-SOURIS PROJECT

I want to say a further word, if I may, about the last project I mentioned, the Missouri-Souris division. According to the testimony before the House, as I read it, no final decision has been made on the location of the canal and lead-off from the diversion dam to the related work in the so-called phase B, namely, units being prepared for construction. I ask Senators to refer to the House hearings at page 911. The Assistant Secretary frankly stated:

> There is a great deal of work that needs to be done before the ultimate feasibility of the irrigation plans can be worked out for the Crosby-Mohall unit or the Jamestown unit, or any of these distant units.

The estimated cost of the phase A aspects of Missouri-Souris, Missouri diversion unit—phase A signifying units selected for construction—is $68,855,000, and the Crosby-Mohall and Devils Lake units in phase B will cost $269,000,000 and $21,000,000, respectively. In addition, the Jamestown unit of Missouri-Souris, which the committee action has moved from phase B to phase A, is estimated to cost $10,749,000.

By taking the first big steps on these projects of Missouri-Souris, we would be getting involved in costs which would run close to $370,000,000. It seems wiser therefore to halt this construction now, since only $1,432,000 has been spent on phase A, until all doubts have been removed concerning the economic feasibility of the project. How can we justify starting out on a road which leads to enormous expenditures when so many questions are still unanswered, and when the President of the United States is asking for a $10,000,000,000 appropriation to conduct a war. I suspect, although the record is not clear, that the provisions for the repayment of the irrigation costs of this project are likewise most incomplete.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. The conclusion I draw from the Senator's remarks is that we made a mistake in the past in adopting a reclamation policy, and that we should not attempt to institute any new projects, either now or in the future, because they would cost money. I believe the Senator overlooks the fact that these projects create wealth. They create much more wealth than they cost. Their construction adds to the wealth of the Nation, and that fact can be proved with respect to all reclamation projects. The taxes paid into the United States Treasury, following the creation of this new wealth, have more than repaid the cost of new projects, and will continue to do so. If the Senator looks at it in terms of dollars and cents, and does not take into consideration the homes which have been provided for people and the wealth which has been added to the Nation, I would agree with him. If the Senator takes the broader view, and considers the wealth which has been created and the taxes which have been paid into the Treasury, I think he is utterly mistaken.

Mr. DOUGLAS. There is the ultimate premise, which the very able Senator from Arizona defends, that these projects pay for themselves. In that connection I may say it has been found that most irrigation projects must seize power revenues in order to pay for themselves. We found that to be true with respect to many irrigation projects.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator is mistaken. He is correct if he looks merely at the amount of money which the Federal Government has paid out and the amount of money which has been paid back. If we look at the wealth that has been created by a project, he is not correct. Let us take, for example, the Salt River project in my State. On that project the Government spent $20,000,000. It created wealth on the basis of which $66,000,000 in income taxes were paid into the Federal Treasury last year. That amount of money would not have been paid into the Treasury if the project had not been constructed, because the land would have remained a desert.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have analyzed some of the irrigation projects which have been proposed during this session. I find the cost per acre of land to be $600, $700, and, in some cases, as high as $1,100. I see before me the very able and beloved Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN]. Land in Vermont is supposed to be the least fertile of any land in the United States. I know he denies it, but it has been alleged to be true.

Mr. AIKEN. It is not true.

Mr. DOUGLAS. At least the hillsides of Vermont are not particularly fertile. If we were to spend $700 or $1,000 an acre on the hillsides of Vermont we could literally make them bloom like a rose, and we would have abundant crops. I should like to know why we should spend $700, $800, or $1,000 an acre on semiarid land and not upon the stony hillsides of Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. I should like to correct the Senator's estimate. I think he said the cost per acre was $700 or $800. I think he should have said $1,700.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is my nature to be conservative. Does the Senator from Vermont say the cost has been $1,700 an acre?

Mr. AIKEN. The cost is estimated to be $1,700 an acre on some projects. If that amount of money were spent the yield per acre would not be any greater than if $100 an acre were spent on that land in Vermont.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator from Vermont. I may say that I have been going over figures showing the price at which land sells north of Bloomington, Ill. The Bloomington area produced not only the very able majority leader of the Senate, but also the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. HUNT], whom we claim as a native son of Illinois. That land is supposed to be the richest land in the Nation. Its selling price does not much exceed $400 an acre. Here we learn that for some projects we are asked to pay $1,700 an acre for desert land.

Mr. AIKEN. Perhaps there is no project proposed in this bill in which an investment would begin to yield the returns which would come from the development of the St. Lawrence seaway. That is a project which would be entirely self-supporting, self-sustaining, and self-liquidating. It has been amazing to me that so many Senators who encourage this type of construction, which at best is of doubtful economic value, insist on objecting to the development of the greatest of all natural resources in North America as to which there is no question of economic feasibility. It is a project which must be developed in the interest of the security of the Nation.

It seems to me that the development of the St. Lawrence seaway should come far ahead of these proposed projects for which we are asked to appropriate hundreds of millions of dollars, and perhaps eventually billions of dollars.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think the Senator from Vermont is entirely correct, as he generally is, that from the ultimate standpoint the St. Lawrence project is probably one of the best projects before us, and that in terms of emergency it is very much more important than the irrigation projects in the Southwest.

Mr. AIKEN. If the Senator from Illinois will permit me to say so, I should like to add that it is entirely possible that if the United States should become engaged in an all-out war, as seems likely, the outcome of that war would depend on whether the St. Lawrence seaway were developed, and whether the great steel industry of America could be maintained in the Central States without the development of the St. Lawrence seaway. It seems to me unthinkable, in view of the position in which the United States finds itself, that there should be any opposition in Congress or out of Congress to the development of the St. Lawrence seaway, because it is so vital to the national economy and security.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I appreciate the speech by the Senator from Vermont, who has been the most persistent and certainly one of the most intelligent advocates of the St. Lawrence seaway. At the moment what I am trying to do is to save money in these appropriations for power and reclamation projects in the West. I am a friend of the West; but we have already provided large appropriations for this area. We have committed ourselves to projects which are extremely costly. Please let us not start new projects, and let us also slow down, in view of the war emergency, the rate at which we build the projects which are already under way.

REDUCTIONS IN RATE OF CONSTRUCTION

Mr. President, in addition to cutting out these new starts and substantially new starts, I believe we should slow down existing projects in general, and reduce appropriations by 25 percent for projects already substantially under way, with the exception of the Colorado-Big Thompson project. This may make the Senator from Colorado wince, but in that case I think we should slow down by 40 percent. And I can defend those suggestions.

If I may make a reference to the Colorado-Big Thompson project, the original estimate of cost was $44,000,000. At that time it was provided that the water users should repay half the cost, but not to exceed $25,000,000. That seemed perfectly fair at the time. If I am incorrect, will Senators check me up by reference to the House hearings, page 733? Now we find that the estimated cost is $150,503,000, but the water users cannot be charged more than $25,000,000, so that $125,000,000 is to be loaded upon the general taxpayer, or upon the power users, one or the other.

I believe it would help if we slowed down the rate of construction. It might even help the Bureau of Reclamation in carrying on negotiations with the water users, so that they would assume a larger proportion of the cost that at present.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAPMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. Does not the Senator recall that the same argument for slowing down he now is making was made against the Grand Coulee project in 1940 and 1941, but by the time we were a little way along with the war emergency, we were very glad we did not slow down the Grand Coulee project?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The amendment which I shall shortly submit, to cut $90,000,000 from this appropriation, will not call for any specific cut on any given project. It is merely a reduction in the total amount, and the Bureau of Reclamation will then have the power and authority to pick out the $204,000,000, let us say, of projects which it regards as most essential for the war effort and the national interest, and derate its energies to them. But it will not have the power to use the full $294,000,000, as would be provided in the pending appropriation bill. Every time a Senator proposes a reduction, other Senators rise and act as though he was intending to cut the heart out of the West. We are not trying to do that. We love the westerners, but we do not believe they should walk off with the National Treasury.

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield for a question.

Mr. HUNT. Will the Senator from Illinois yield for an observation?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; if I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, the very skilled economist from my native State is exceptionally clever in presenting his arguments for reductions in appropriations for reclamation projects purely from the standpoint of reading the numerals in the book. I should like to say to the very distinguished junior Senator from Illinois that had he lived on and immediately adjacent to a reclamation project, as I have, for the past 30 years, he would not today be making the argument he is making, for the reasons which I shall state.

In my own county there is a small reclamation project known as the Riverton project, upon which there has been expended some $13,000,000, to bring land under water. The crops already produced on that project total in excess of $17,000,000.

Aside from that, the small town, which is the center of this reclamation project, Riverton, Wyo., only a few years ago had a population of perhaps 1,000. The census just completed shows this town now has a population in excess of 4,500. The property in that area in the last several years, perhaps the past 5 years, shows appreciation in value from $12,000,000 to $41,000,000.

I should say to the distinguished Senator from Illinois that carloads of furniture, carloads of automobiles, carloads of many things manufactured in the East, come to that section, and payment for those various commodities comes from the pockets of the people living on the reclamation project there. So the end result of reclamation is pumping prosperity into the home State of my distinguished colleague from Illinois.

Mr. President, some years ago a committee from the Congress was investigating reclamation projects on the ground. It so happened that a distinguished Representative from Michigan was a member of the committee. He did not favor reclamation. When the committee detrained and were going up the street, one member of the committee called the attention of the distinguished Representative from Michigan to the line of automobiles on either side of the street. He said to him, "Where do you think those automobiles come from?" Of course the distinguished Representative said, "Michigan." "Where do you think the money came from to pay for them? It was from the reclamation project."

Mr. President, I could go on endlessly reciting the tremendous increase in value of land, valuation of property, and increase in business, around that reclamation project, due solely and only to that project, which today has a tremendous impact on our total economy, with which the distinguished professor from the University of Chicago is so familiar.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I wish to congratulate my good friend the junior Senator from Wyoming for this eulogy of the advantages of water. Let me say, to allay his fears about his particular project at Riverton, on which so much seems to depend, including the future of the automobile industry, that instead of the $3,200,000 contemplated in the Senate committee report, cutbacks which I have suggested would bring the appropriation for Riverton to about $2,250,000. Riverton would not be denied the opportunity of getting water, but there would be merely a slowing down in the rate at which the water would be brought to Riverton and adjacent communities.

Mr. President, many of the irrigation projects have been very fine, but we are beginning to wake up to the fact that with present construction costs, the costs per acre in many cases are apparently in excess of the benefits conferred. If the value conferred were only equal to the costs, we could recover by means of special assessments upon the water users; but in virtually every irrigation project that is proposed, the water users ask to be exempted from participating in all of the costs. They will take only a portion of the costs and shoulder the rest of the cost onto the power users, or upon the Federal Treasury.

Mr. President, I may remind my good friend of what he perhaps is fully aware of, while on the power projects interest is included, in the irrigation projects interest is not included as a cost, though I think it properly should be.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Wyoming has said to me, sotto voce, that he would like to ask me a question, and I now yield to him for a question.

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, I wish to make a very brief observation, and then ask the distinguished Senator a question. For a great many years it has been very evident that businesses in the area of a reclamation project profit to an equal extent, or perhaps to a greater extent, than do the settlers on the project. Yet, with the exception of the income from power, the settler himself is expected to pay the total cost of the project.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Without interest, however.

Mr. HUNT. I now want to ask the distinguished Senator from Illinois a question. It is not a leading question, and I can assure the Senator that it is a question asked in perfect good faith. I should like to ask the distinguished economist—and I say that because the answer to the question bears on economy—does he not think that those who profit so greatly from a reclamation project, other than the settler, should, through some method of taxation, help to pay for the project? I mean the lumberman, the banker, the garageman, indeed, everyone who moves into the community and becomes a successful businessman. Should they not help to pay through taxes some part of the cost of that reclamation project?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I may say to my good friend from Wyoming that the idea of secondary benefits and tertiary benefits is a very delusive one. The same argument could be advanced if we want to develop the banana industry in Illinois or in Vermont. We could build hothouses for the purpose and grow bananas, and as a result of growing bananas in either Illinois or Vermont there would be increased employment in the surrounding towns, which would boom, and there would be a demand for glass, there would be a demand for power, so that other industries would benefit, and therefore they should contribute to the cost of the project.

The question comes down to total cost as compared to the total benefit. When irrigation costs rise to $600 and $700 or $1,000 an acre—and the Senator from Vermont has assured us that he knows of some projects where the cost is $1,700 an acre—whereas the most fertile land in America, north of Bloomington, the land which gave the junior Senator from Wyoming to the world, sells for only $425 an acre, I submit that, in the words of Benjamin Franklin, we are "paying too much for our whistle."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator from Illinois has stated that the land above Bloomington, which certainly is as fine land as there is in any farming area, is selling for $400 an acre.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Perhaps $425.

Mr. ANDERSON. I wish to suggest to the Senator that citrus groves in California sell for $3,000 or $4,000 an acre. I see the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] on the floor. He may say that similar land will probably sell for more than that in his State. Does not the Senator from Illinois believe that the going price for this land is some indication of its value; that if it sells for $3,000 an acre, with water on it, or if it sells for $4,000 an acre, the man who farms it knows what he is doing.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then let the water users pay the cost to the Government, plus interest.

Mr. ANDERSON. I should like to suggest that there was a time in this country when it was regarded as economically not feasible to have an irrigation project where the cost per acre exceeded $45. It took us many years before we reached the point where we would say that the cost should exceed $90. When I received an assessment against my own lands of $90 an acre I thought it was outrageous, because other lands similarly situated had been assessed at $45 an acre. Now an assessment of $150, $200, or $250 an acre is not regarded as excessive. Does not the Senator from Illinois believe that the change in the value of the dollar has something to do with the extra costs?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; certainly. I would not object to $150 or $200 or possibly $250 an acre in areas where the figures show it can pay out, but when we get up to $600 or $700 or $1,000, it is pretty high. While I hold no brief for the State of California, and have only been a tourist there occasionally—and we cannot expect that every State will be like California—I do not believe that with all the native pride which the people of the Southwest have they would claim that the fertility of New Mexico is the same as the fertility of California.

Mr. ANDERSON. I would not, of course, try to compare anything in my State with the excellence of California. But I do wish to suggest that an acre of land in California or in the reaches along the Rio Grande south of El Paso that produces two and a half bales of cotton to the acre, is more valuable than an acre of land that produces one-half bale to the acre, and that farming costs, being what they are, the land producing more is worth very much more to the farmer than land producing less. The Senator should bear in mind that this process of irrigation has been going on for a long time. The first project took the best locations.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct.

Mr. ANDERSON. The finest dam sites were picked out. The valleys that were most easily irrigable were chosen. And now we are getting a little bit toward the end of the stack, and the projects are more costly. But I believe the Senator should have a yardstick by which to measure accurately. It is not just a question of how many dollars, but it is a question: Is the project economically worth while to the country itself? The point the distinguished senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] made, and which the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. McFARLAND] has made many times is, that in the Central Valley is a project which cost $20,000,000 but which each year returns back into the Treasury $60,000,000 in income taxes. That is true with respect to every irrigation project, not perhaps to the same degree. The collateral benefits to the Treasury of the United States I think need to be borne in mind.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I may say it is undoubtedly true that on many of the early irrigation projects the costs were more reasonable, but with his characteristic frankness the Senator now states that we are now scraping the bottom of the barrel, and we are undertaking new projects on which the unit costs are extremely high. I think we have probably reached the point where we should not go much further, particularly in the present national emergency.

I am glad to see my good friend, the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] on the floor, because in his absence I was compelled to say something about the Colorado-Big Thompson project, the cost of which originally was estimated to be about $44,000,000, half to be repaid from water; but the present cost is estimated to be $150,000,000, and now only one-sixth of the cost of the Colorado-Big Thompson is to be paid by the water users and five-sixths will have to be paid either by the power users or by the taxpayers.

The other day I jumped into a hornets' nest in dealing with an attempt to cut the appropriations for roads. I have discovered now that the hornets which grow in the Southwest, while a very lovable type of hornets, are nevertheless extremely powerful and potent, and I feel that the hornets' nest of the other day is as nothing as compared to the hornets' nest of today. I see that a number of my good friends from the Southwest are on their feet seeking to obtain the floor, and I think I will have to take them in turn. I yield first to the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. McFARLAND].

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I merely wish to say to my good friend from Illinois that I am afraid he is a hornet, because he goes around trying to sting everyone else except the people of his own State. I should like to demonstrate that now, I hope to his satisfaction. Let us consider flood-control projects in Illinois. By keeping the water of the rivers in their channels the land adjacent to the rivers is made very valuable. The main difference between irrigation and flood control is that in irrigation water is taken out of the channel and put on the land, whereas in the case of flood control water is kept in the channel, thereby making the adjacent land very valuable.

The distinguished Senator from Illinois is advocating that the farmers pay interest on irrigation developments. The people whose land adjoins the rivers which are controlled by flood-control projects have land which is made more valuable by expenditure of money for flood control. Does the Senator from Illinois feel that the people of his State who have benefited very much by flood control should be made to pay principal and interest on such flood-control projects? If he does, I hope the next time there comes before the Senate a flood-control bill which deals with the State of Illinois he will ask that on that particular project the people who are benefited be made to reimburse the Government for the cost, and pay interest on the project. Otherwise, I do not want to hear the Senator talk about the necessity for such action to be taken in connection with irrigation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The question the Senator from Arizona has asked is a very pertinent one. It is very true that in connection with many flood-control projects adjacent land which is benefited and largely redeemed from being alluvial swamp land and made into good farm land, is improved very greatly by such flood control. But I am afraid my good friend from Arizona was not present when the rivers and harbors bill was considered, because I submitted an amendment to it which provided that half the cost of the construction of levees be assessed against the land directly benefited. I did not secure many votes for that amendment.

Mr. McFARLAND. Was that in connection with an Illinois project?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am in favor of such assessment with respect to all flood-control projects, including those in Illinois.

Mr. McFARLAND. I may say I did not hear the Senator from Illinois make any such proposal with respect to an Illinois project.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I am in favor of such a proposal applying to all projects—including those in Illinois, Mississippi, Alabama, and so forth.

However, I think only about six Senators voted with me on my amendment. I do not remember that the Senator from Arizona voted with me, but he may not have been on the floor of the Senate when that vote was taken.

However, I am delighted to have the Senator from Arizona as a convert; and the next time such matters come before the Senate I hope he will be on my side.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, the Senator has not converted me. I believe that flood control is worth all the money it costs, and even more. Likewise, I also believe that irrigation and reclamation are most important to the economy of the United States. They constitute the only remaining frontier of our country.

I regret very much that our distinguished friend, the Senator from Illinois, a man who has been so foresighted in so many respects and has believed in progress and has believed in affording an opportunity for the youth of the country and people generally who wish to make homes for themselves, cannot be sufficiently foresighted to realize the benefits of irrigation and reclamation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, it so happens, of course, that the Bureau of Reclamation has no projects in Illinois, and therefore the proposals for economy which I am making now are proposals which, if adopted by the Senate, will result in the making of reductions at the expense of other States. However, Illinois' turn will come when the civil-functions bill—the so-called Army engineers' bill—comes before the Senate; and I shall not spare Illinois when that time comes.

I shall not launch upon any lengthy process of self-justification, Mr. President; but I think I can say that in Illinois I have opposed proceeding with two big river and harbor projects. There is one project—not yet authorized, but proposed—calling for an expenditure in excess of $100,000,000, to widen and deepen the canal between Moline, on the Mississippi River, and Hennepin, on the Illinois River. I have gone to Moline and to Rock Island, and I have opposed that project; and I have gone up and down the canal and have said that I do not think it is needed any more than a Hottentot needs a white tie and tails.

Furthermore, there is in South Chicago another project, in regard to which I had a little exchange at arms with the esteemed senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] last year—the so-called Cal-Sag project, calling for an ultimate appropriation of approximately $78,000,000. It is a worthy project in general, but I have declined to sponsor that project this year. I went to South Chicago, and there I helped to pay the cost of renting a hall for a meeting at which I explained that because of the need for economy, I was opposed to the project at this time.

Mr. President, I would not have mentioned these matters, had not the Senator said that I was in favor of economy at the expense of someone else. I fully understand that if we take the pathway of economy, we must be willing to apply it to ourselves and to our own States. I understand that, and I am willing to do so. However, I ask that all of us apply the same standard to ourselves.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois has made some reference to the Big Thompson project, in Colorado.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I wish to say that, generally speaking, I commend the Senator from Illinois for his efforts along the line of economy. I think it is splendid that a fight is being made for economy and for a reduction in spending. I believe that is one of the very great needs of our country.

Mr. President, I wish to commend the Senator—and I hope he will listen to what I am saying now.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I certainly will listen to the Senator. I turned aside for a moment to obtain some figures bearing on a question which I believe the Senator will ask me.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, as I was saying, I am trying to pay a compliment to the Senator—a rather tortured compliment, perhaps.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I am most grateful for any compliment which is paid me by the Senator from Colorado, even if it is tortured. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I wish to pay tribute to the Senator from Illinois for his efforts to obtain economy.

Of course, there are two kinds of spending in the United States. One is spending which will result in an investment, the other is spending from which no return is obtained.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I do not wish to make a wisecrack at the expense of the Senator from Colorado; but I would say that an investment is generally considered a spending of money in one's own State, whereas an expenditure is a spending of money somewhere else.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I do not make any such distinction as that. I think there is a very logical difference between an expenditure which brings no return and an expenditure for a project which not only will continue to serve the Nation, but will result in having returned to the Federal Treasury all the money it spent on the project.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then, is the Senator from Colorado in favor of the St. Lawrence project, for which not only the principal, but the interest would be returned to the Federal Treasury?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. In the Senate I have opposed the St. Lawrence project for a long time, but for entirely different reasons. I do not think that project can be compared with the reclamation projects.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The St. Lawrence project is located in the northeastern section of the United States; and that project, when constructed, will return to the Treasury not only the principal but the interest.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I do not care to get into a discussion of the St. Lawrence project, because it involves a question different from the one with which we are dealing now.

At this time I wish to talk about the Big Thompson project. As the Senator from Illinois has said, the over-all cost of the Big Thompson project has risen, until finally it is nearly three times what it was originally estimated to be. That increase has been caused by several factors. One is the increase in the cost of construction.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is not the increase also due to a change to more elaborate plans?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I was about to mention that factor, also. The changes which have been made in the plans for that project are similar to the changes which often are made in the plans for building a house. After the plans for a house have been drawn up, sometimes it is decided to add a bay window or to make other changes, and of course such changes result in increasing the cost. A similar experience has been had in respect to the Big Thompson project. However, all the changes proposed for that project will serve well the people of that area.

The Senator from Illinois spoke of $25,000,000 to be repaid by the locality. That is true. The people of the locality to be served by the Big Thompson project have placed a tax levy upon all their holdings in the towns and cities, and they have agreed to pay $25,000,000 to the Federal Government to take care of some of the cost of building the Big Thompson project. At that time it was believed that the Big Thompson project would cost approximately $50,000,000. However, now we know that it will cost approximately $150,000,000. Nevertheless, that project has been begun.

Let me say that recently I read in the press a very wise statement which was attributed to the Senator from Illinois, namely, that once a man puts his hand to the plow, he must go on through to the end of the furrow. I thought that was a very wise statement, and it applies especially to the Big Thompson project, for in that case we have put our hand to the plow; the Federal Government has undertaken a great irrigation project and a great power project. We have begun it. Every time we hold back or restrict or delay the appropriations for that project in the annual appropriation bills, the more damage we do, not only to that locality, but to the Federal Government itself. Someday that project will be finished, and when it is finished it will begin to pay back. The more we delay the construction of the project, the longer it will take to get our money back.

I should like to say a word further, after which I shall not delay the Senator, because I note that other Senators desire to interrupt him. The Big Thompson will pay back every cent. The use of the water will pay a part of it. The sale of electricity will represent the balance. Our friends in Wyoming and Nebraska, as well as sections of Colorado who will get none of the water are sending in applications for the electricity to be generated there. There is already a greater demand for all the electricity to be generated by the Big Thompson project than it will be able to produce. So it is a good project. It is providing supplementary water to one of the finest and best agricultural regions in all the country. It does not need my defense. The Senator should come to Colorado, and go over the Big Thompson project. He ought to inspect the project, and see the tunnel through the Rocky Mountains which is 13 miles in length and, as I understand, the longest tunnel in the United States. He should see the water being brought through that tunnel, the country which is to be irrigated, the fine little towns and cities which are to be supplied with electricity, and which pledged their credit to the payment of this project. Then I think the Senator would be very reluctant to propose delays to the progress and completion of the Big Thompson project.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, there seems to be a process of antiphonal singing here, a verse by some distinguished Senator which calls for a reply.

I am not proposing that the work on the Big Thompson should be stopped. I am merely proposing that we shall proceed at a somewhat slower rate than is projected.

The present appropriations call for about $21,000,000 worth of work to be done in the current year. I think that could be cut back. In general, I am suggesting that there should be a cutback of 25 percent, but I think that in the case of the Big Thompson, where the water-payment situation is so uncertain and inadequate, the cut could be still more.

LARGE FEDERAL DEFICIT FEEDS INFLATION

There is another consideration which should be borne in mind. We already have a Government deficit of $3,000,000,000 for the past year, and unless we cut the appropriation bill for the year 1950–51, we shall have a deficit of, say, $4,000,000,000. On top of that, we are going to have the war expenditures. The President has asked for $10,000,000,000, and we are going to give it to him, but we all know that probably beyond that requested appropriation of $10,000,000,000 will be requests for further sums of money.

The prospects are that unless we put into effect a most rigorous tax-increase bill, the deficit for the year 1950–51 will be very great. How does the Government get the money for that deficit? It borrows from the banks, primarily. And what do the banks do? They create credit upon which the Government draws, and in effect we write up the credit and bank deposits of the country and increase the number of money counters which may be offered for goods, with the result that the prices are bid up and inflation results. The larger the deficit, the more the borrowing, the greater the rise in prices. The smaller the deficit, the smaller the rise in prices, and the less inflation.

I submit, Mr. President, that we have to make our decisions not merely in general terms, but as specific items come up, and we should decrease the deficit so that there will not be this great competition on the part of the Government with those bidding for scarce materials and scarce labor. Every million dollars we put into Big Thompson and into other projects, either directly or indirectly, bids labor and materials away from the war effort.

We must ask ourselves, Are dollars worth more on the Big Thompson than in producing munitions or artillery or tanks, or equipping troops? We must ask ourselves that question. If we ask ourselves that question, I think it is pretty clear that it would be better in the national interest to slow down the rate of construction of these projects so as to release purchasing power, materials, and men for the more direct war effort, and then, when the war is over, as we hope it will be soon, these projects can be picked up again.

Mr. AIKEN and Mr. YOUNG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield, and if so to whom?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I promised to yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Illinois referred a while ago to the Missouri-Souris project as a very colossal affair.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct. I cited that particular case.

Mr. YOUNG. It would cost approximately $270,000,000, but it is a project which is spread over three States—Montana, North Dakota, and South Dakota. I do not know any project which would lend more stability to the economy of these States than that project. It would provide forage and feed in the dry years, and, as the Senator knows, we have some dry years there, and we have some very good ones. It is a very good trade territory for the city of Chicago, and I hope the Senator will come out to North Dakota and view our problems at first hand.

Mr. DOUGLAS. There could be nothing better than for the Senator to spend some time in North Dakota with the able junior Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. YOUNG. The larger part of this irrigation project would be in North Dakota. The acreage would not be so great in comparison to total acreage of the States, but it would provide the feed necessary for carrying us over the dry years and many more profitable cash crops. It would make for us a more prosperous State and would help to maintain the national economy. The State of North Dakota passed what is known as a conservancy district act last year, guaranteeing to levy on all of the affected property its share of the cost of this dam. It would take a good many years to complete the project. I should like to point out also that it is in various units. The one on which it is proposed to start construction now is in Montana, in the northeastern area, probably the driest part of that State, where perhaps more than any other place in the United States a water project is needed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I may say to my good friend from North Dakota that, as he says, the ultimate cost of these projects is very great. The ultimate cost of phase A of the Missouri-Souris project is approximately $79,000,000, since the Senate committee has transferred the Jamestown unit to phase A, and the Crosby-Mohall and Devils Lake units in phase B will cost approximately $270,000,000 and $21,077,000, respectively, or a total of $369,000,000. But there has been expended upon these projects, as my figures indicated, about $1,432,000, to date. As to the ultimate need of these projects, there is question by the Bureau of Reclamation, itself, because, as I quoted Mr. Warne's testimony, he frankly admitted—and I quote again:

> There is a great deal of work that needs to be done before ultimate feasibility of the irrigation plans can be worked out for the Crosby-Mohall unit or the Jamestown unit or any of the distant units.

And, in the case of the Missouri diversion unit, the location of the planned canal is not yet determined.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. In a moment. In lieu of the doubts about the ultimate feasibility, in view of the fact that the amounts spent to date have been very slight, and therefore we would not lose so much if we halted the work, and in view of the national situation, it would seem to me unwise to plunge in with substantial additional appropriations now, which then would commit us to proceed more rapidly with this tremendous program, which will ultimately cost at least $370,000,000. And we can be fairly certain that before the Bureau gets through, the cost would be $500,000,000, because the Bureau, like the Army engineers, can always be trusted to have its projects cost infinitely more than they first estimated the cost to be.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. YOUNG. So far as the project in North Dakota is concerned, of course, there is no money being spent for construction there now. It is all being spent for investigation to prove its feasibility. There have not been large sums of money spent. In fact, if we proceed at the rate we are proceeding now, it would probably take a thousand years to complete the project, which, under normal circumstances, probably could be completed within 10 to 20 years. I may point out to the Senator that no construction is going on within the borders of the State of North Dakota.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But if this bill goes through, will not the construction of some of the dams actually start?

Mr. YOUNG. No. Regarding the Missouri-Souris project, that is on the Montana side, and it is a unit by itself.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But the construction of dams will start.

Mr. YOUNG. There has been an appropriation for the Missouri-Souris diversion dam in Montana, but no definite date has been set for letting a construction contract.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But I mean that if a start is made on it, as the construction schedule of the Bureau indicated, it will be on page 906 of the House hearings, then we are committed to the project. And while this Montana unit costs $69,000,000, the related units cost an additional $300,000,000, and we shall be told we are committed to it all.

Mr. YOUNG. No, no.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is my point.

Mr. YOUNG. No; the Senator is in error about that. We are not committed to the entire project—just the Montana unit, which is a small part of that total project.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from Illinois has noticed in the message of the President this morning that the President reminded Senators of the fact that we cannot use the same men and materials in construction work that we have to have in fighting the war. I should like to quote from the message:

> I am directing all executive agencies to conduct a detailed review of Government programs, for the purpose of modifying them wherever practicable to lessen the demand upon services, commodities, raw materials, manpower, and facilities which are in competition with those needed for national defense.

In other words, the President recognizes that we shall have to cut out some of these projects while we are engaged in war. It is not only a question of money; it is a question of men and materials which will be required. It seems to me it would be the best judgment simply to complete the projects which are nearly completed and which can be completed in time to be of some value in the war effort, and not to start a myriad of new projects at this time. We should wait until we see whether we win the war. I assume we shall win it, but let us be sure we shall win it. If we begin turning down absolutely essential projects, such as the St. Lawrence seaway, on which the great steel industries will soon be dependent, there is a possibility that we may not win the war. So let us not take any chances. Let us pay heed to the message of the President in which he plainly indicates that the starting of new projects will have to be discontinued for the time being.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Vermont for the reinforcing testimony he has given. I tried to point out, in more imperfect fashion, that if we were trying to divert men and materials from less necessary civilian projects to war projects, there is a reciprocal obligation upon us to divert men and materials from less necessary governmental projects to war projects. I am surprised that the seeds which the Senator from Vermont and the junior Senator from Illinois have been trying to sow in the Senate seems to have fallen on such infertile soil.

I now yield to my beloved friend, the senior Senator from North Dakota, who, by the way, is one of my very best friends in the Senate.

Mr. LANGER. I thank the Senator, indeed. I should like to ask my distinguished friend if he has ever been in Montana or North Dakota?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. LANGER. In the northern part of Montana?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I spent a summer in Montana.

Mr. LANGER. Where?

Mr. DOUGLAS. In Glacier Park.

Mr. LANGER. That does not surprise me.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But I went through a great deal of North Dakota and Montana in the struggle to get there. I enjoyed both States very much. They produce fine people and splendid Senators.

Mr. LANGER. May I ask what year it was when the Senator visited Montana?

Mr. DOUGLAS. It was a great many years ago.

Mr. LANGER. More than 20 years ago?

Mr. DOUGLAS. It was probably 20 years ago.

Mr. LANGER. That was when the Senator was a very young man.

Mr. DOUGLAS. No. I am rather advanced in years, now, so I was a middle-aged man at that time.

Mr. LANGER. Does the Senator know that during a drought, in a distance of 500 miles from North Dakota all the way to Havre, Mont., on the Great Northern Railroad, only one carload of wheat was shipped from those millions of acres?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I know the distinguished senior Senator from North Dakota was then the Governor of his State, and I am sure he knows everything that happens in North Dakota, and particularly what happened during that period. I would never question any fact that the senior Senator from North Dakota reports.

Mr. LANGER. Does the Senator know that conditions were so bad that we had to ship out all our cattle except a foundation herd?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I say "Yes" to anything the Senator says is a statement of fact.

Mr. LANGER. Does the Senator know, for example, that a man named Charles Whitman, who put in his life establishing a fine herd of white-faced cattle, had only seven head left under the program of Mr. Wallace? Does the Senator know that?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not know that, but I am sure the Senator would not tell an untruth, so I make my standardized reply, that I accept his statement.

Mr. LANGER. Does the honorable Senator know that up to 5 years ago Montana had 1,712,205 acres of irrigated land and North Dakota had only 17,409 acres?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not know that. I think if the Senator will examine the Montana figures, it will be found that the amount was 1,712,205½ acres.

Mr. LANGER. I want to be accurate. Does not the Senator believe that we in North Dakota are entitled to have irrigation, the same as any other States?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I may say to my good friend from North Dakota that I wish his State well. If there are irrigation projects, the cost of which is not excessively high, I should be delighted to vote for them, but where the irrigation costs are in excess of the value of the land irrigated, I think it is pretty clear that the project should not be carried out.

Mr. LANGER. Wait a minute.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator has been asking me questions, and I want to ask him a question.

Mr. LANGER. I desire to comment on what the Senator has said. The Senator mentioned the cost of irrigation. The Senator knows that the cost is all paid back by the farmers who do the irrigating.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I may say, in the first place, the interest is not paid back, and, in the second place, we increasingly find that a large portion of the capital costs are being unloaded on power, and I think it may be very questionable in some cases whether even under those conditions the capital cost can be repaid from power revenue.

Mr. LANGER. Does the Senator know——

Mr. DOUGLAS. May I answer the Senator's question before he asks another one?

Mr. LANGER. Does the Senator know of a single irrigation project the cost of which has not been paid back?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would say that time has a great many more years in which to unfold.

Mr. LANGER. I agree with that statement.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As to the cost per acre, when the cost is $700 an acre or beyond that amount, we are reaching a point where the costs will not be repaid by the owners of land or the users of water, except a small percentage of cases.

Mr. LANGER. Can the distinguished Senator name one single project in North Dakota or in Montana where the cost ever went up as high as he has indicated?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have been going over some of the costs in Idaho and Nevada, and they are almost astronomical. Will the distinguished Senator please tell me what the cost per acre of irrigated land in the Missouri-Souris project will be?

Mr. LANGER. At the present time it is problematical, but whatever it is it will be paid back.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Instead of the Senator hiding behind the word "problematical," since he is so accurate in giving the acres of irrigated land down to the last digit, will he tell me within $100 what the average cost will be in North Dakota?

Mr. LANGER. Let me tell my distinguished friend that he knows it is impossible to answer that question, for this reason——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Take the estimated capital cost and divide by the number of thousands of acres of land to be irrigated. We are doing a little bit of arithmetic in the corner here, and we shall have the figures for the RECORD in a moment.

Mr. LANGER. There are approximately half a million acres which the Bureau of Reclamation has stated may not be capable of being irrigated. If we get the water up 10 feet and find the land cannot be irrigated, the cost of the project is great. But does the Senator know of a single project where the money has not been paid back?

Mr. DOUGLAS. There is a day of reckoning coming, may I say to my good friend.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I had intended to speak for only a few minutes, but the questions asked have kept me on my feet for an hour and a half. I now yield to my beloved friend from Montana.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I think the Senator will be unable to find any case in the State of Montana or the State of North Dakota where the value of the improvements has been more than the value of the land.

The Senator would not want to see those sections of the United States completely destroyed as a result of failure of the reclamation programs. Populations are being lost in North Dakota, South Dakota, and Montana as a result of drought conditions. Without these projects which we propose to construct these States would be economically destroyed, because the soil is rapidly being blown away as a result of dry years.

Mr. LANGER. I ask unanimous consent that I may ask the Senator from Montana three questions without the Senator from Illinois losing the floor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I shall yield in a minute. For the sake of enlightenment I should like to put some figures in the RECORD. The total cost of the projects would amount, under the present figures, to $369,000,000. The maximum number of acres which could be irrigated, according to the figures of the Bureau of Reclamation, would be roughly 1,250,000 acres.

Mr. LANGER. The Senator's figures are wrong.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I understand that of that total a little more than 500,000 acres probably would not be irrigated, or at least there is some doubt about it. Therefore we have a unit cost of $290 and possibly up to $490 an acre if we allocated the entire cost to irrigation.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. The figures are entirely wrong.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If they are wrong we shall correct them. Since we do not have information as to cost allocations between irrigation, power, flood control and navigation, it is difficult to make estimates now. And that is my point. The feasibility of the project needs fuller analysis before we appropriate more money for it.

Mr. MURRAY. I have no other comment to make except to say that the Senator's position in reference to these reclamation projects is wrong. It does not seem to me that we can afford to deny these appropriations, because they are necessary to carry out reclamation projects in the Northwestern States. If we wish to keep the Northwestern States a great productive area, and as a supplier of food and material for our economy, we must carry out these programs.

Mr. DOUGLAS. At the very time that we are withdrawing some land from cultivation under the acreage restriction program of the Department of Agriculture, we are throwing additional land into cultivation by means of irrigation. It is a contradictory policy, but I shall not press it further at this time. I now yield to the Senator from West Virginia, whom I observe on his feet.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, we have just witnessed the unusual spectacle on this floor of the scholarly Senator and beloved statesman from Illinois, with whom we do not always agree, shaking hands with his opponent in debate, the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER]. Let me admonish my friend from North Dakota to remember the following from the Holy Bible:

> And Joab said to Amasa, "Art thou in health, my brother?" And Joab took Amasa by the beard with the right hand to kiss him.
> But Amasa took no heed to the sword that was in Joab's hand; so he smote him therewith in the fifth rib and shed out his bowels to the ground.

In my opinion, the distinguished Senator from Illinois will, with his long, sharp, logical sword, soon follow Joab's example. Therefore, it is my hope that the Senator from North Dakota, while he still has his bowels and his brain, will beat an orderly retreat to the other side of the aisle.

Mr. LANGER. I shall do so.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have no such intention as the Senator from West Virginia fears. The only possible thing I could have to thrust at the Senator from North Dakota would be a bouquet of roses.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, the Senator's observation proves that he is a worthy successor of the renowned Senator "Ham" Lewis. On a certain occasion, as my good friend, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], will recall, Senator Lewis made a withering remark to a Senator from Indiana who had interrupted him. The rebuked Senator complained of the severity of Senator Lewis' retort. Thereupon, in his inimitable Chesterfieldian way, Senator Lewis said, "I assure my friend from Indiana that although I always wear my intellectual rapier loose in its scabbard, I shall never again thrust it at him, without first pointing it with a rose." Congratulations to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] for his compassion and felicitations to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] for the safety which his opponent has just assured him.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield for a question.

Mr. WATKINS. Will the Senator yield for a comment with a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, I am sorry I had to leave the Chamber for a moment and missed the fine colloquy between the Senator from the West and the distinguished Senator from Illinois. I am wondering if, in making his calculations of the cost of land per acre for irrigation purposes in the West and of the cost of these reclamation projects, the Senator has taken into consideration the fact that of the total sum of money appropriated in this bill a large amount is provided for items other than reclamation and irrigation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Oh yes; power and flood control and navigation.

Mr. WATKINS. Has the Senator calculated the exact cost of the part allocated to irrigation to determine what the cost per acre would be?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I may say that the Bureau of Reclamation itself has not figured the proper allocation between power and irrigation. In view of that fact, how can the Senator from Illinois do something which the Bureau of Reclamation itself confesses it is unable to do?

Mr. WATKINS. Is the Senator acquainted with the contracts which are made between the Bureau of Reclamation and water users, in which that distinction and the allocations are made.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am acquainted with some contracts. I know that generally the effort is made to load the major part of the cost of construction upon the power users, and to free the water users.

Mr. WATKINS. Does the Senator also understand that in the West the first priority on the streams of the West is for consumptive uses, not only for irrigation but for domestic use by human beings and by industry in a consumptive way? For example, a steel plant must have a certain amount of water to use in the making of steel. When all that is taken into consideration, does the Senator realize that the actual cost of the water is not the important consideration, for the simple reason that the water itself in a consumptive way must be put to beneficial use; otherwise the power will be valueless. In other words, it would not make any difference how many power projects we had in the West; if we did not have water for people and for industry to use in a consumptive way, the power would be absolutely valueless. As a matter of fact, the stream development which the Senator has been talking about must be considered on a basin-wide basis. If the income from the entire project—power, industry, and the consumptive use of water—makes the entire program self liquidating, the program is justified.

I think the Senator should also bear in mind that the resources and the possible development of the streams on an over-all basin-wide basis must be taken into consideration to determine whether a project is feasible. It is distinctly unfair to pick out the irrigation end and say it is being subsidized at the expense of the other features. There would not be any power development unless people are brought onto the land. People must have homes, farms, and industries.

I may also point out to the Senator that in view of the present situation in the world—and I am going to bring in the argument as to the war, because I think it is certainly material at this point—if people are going to move from the cities they must have a place to which to go, and there is no better place for safety than in the mountainous and the arid sections of the West. They must have homes, and water must be available for irrigation and for domestic uses and other uses. In that way we make an investment in security. Therefore the projects which are under way should not be delayed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Would the Senator from Utah suggest doubling the appropriation in order to add to security against atomic attack?

Mr. WATKINS. I think that it would be one of the best investments this country could possibly make.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Would the Senator from Utah suggest tripling the appropriation?

Mr. WATKINS. We would have to keep within our possibilities; but I would reduce the long-range reclamation projects and power projects we are building for Europe at the present time, and put the money in our projects at home. Certainly that would strengthen us more than putting the money in Europe would benefit us. At least we know it would be for our use, and it would not be put in the hands of a possible enemy by virtue of the desertion of a third or fourth of the population who are Communists at heart.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Has the Senator concluded?

Mr. WATKINS. I wanted to know whether the Senator had taken all these things into consideration in making his estimate of the value of irrigation in the West under the present program.

I should like also to call to the Senator's attention the fact that in World War II many reclamation projects were under way. There was one in Utah. It had not been quite finished, but along came a program for building a steel plant in Utah. One was desired there for making steel plates for the Navy. It was found the plant could not be operated without water, and it was fortunate we had a project halfway finished. Mountain water was necessary in making the steel. Other water would not do, because it would leave defects in the steel. The Government went ahead and finished the project so that the steel plant could be completed. Then they brought in thousands of people, and they found there was a shortage of water in the cities and towns. If there had been a drought many of the installations, the Army stores, the Navy camps, and the like, in that State, would have had to move out. It was fortunate we had a reclamation project under way which could be finished to such a degree that they could get water. So that the over-all picture is favorable to the development of reclamation projects.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I hope the Senator from Utah will forgive me if I say that his argument reminds me of a passage in Benjamin Franklin's autobiography, in which he said that—

So excellent a thing it is to be a reasonable creature because one can then find a reason for what one wants to do.

Mr. President, I had not intended to take up as much time as I have taken. I think the RECORD will show that a vast portion of the time has been consumed in cross-examination.

I now move that the figure "$294,713,000" in line 5, on page 247, be stricken out and the figure "$204,000,000" be substituted in its stead.

I ask unanimous consent that there may be inserted in the RECORD at this point a brief justification and summary which I have prepared for this reduction, and which I have tried to state orally on the floor.

Mr. LANGER. Will the Senator tell me who prepared the justification?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. McCulloch, my assistant, and I. The two of us prepared it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois?

There being no objection, the justification was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR PAUL H. DOUGLAS IN SUPPORT OF SUBSTITUTE AMENDMENT TO REDUCE CONSTRUCTION AND REHABILITATION APPROPRIATIONS OF THE DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF RECLAMATION, TO $204,000,000

Page 247, lines 4 and 5: House bill, $297,467,000; Senate bill, $294,713,000; budget estimate, $325,966,500.

The Bureau of Reclamation projects for which construction and rehabilitation appropriations are included in the present bill, include a number of new starts and items on which so little will apparently be completed by the end of fiscal 1950 that they may be considered essentially new starts. In line with the general policy against appropriations for such new construction starts this year, these should be omitted.

In view of the President's message today, the general need for reduction in Federal expenditures and the higher priority which other items in this omnibus bill should be accorded, the rate of expenditure for projects now under construction should be substantially reduced for 1951. I am suggesting in general that this reduction be in the amount of 25 percent of the proposed expenditure in the Senate committee bill.

Not only the general budget situation of the Federal Government, but also the certain expansion in the demand for funds and materials for other more essential Government work and for the crucial defense work which the President has outlined in the months ahead should persuade us to make reductions at least to the extent I have suggested.

With certain other decreases, which I shall note below, the suggested reduction in this appropriation is $90,713,000, and the new figure which I propose that the Senate adopt by way of a substitute amendment to the committee amendment (of $294,713,000) in line 5 on page 247 is $204,000,000.

While I have itemized these new starts, weak projects and percentage reductions, it is not the intention of this amendment to bind the Bureau of Reclamation to these particular amounts. I recognize that it is preferable to leave discretion in this matter to the Bureau, so that it may cut back more sharply those projects that may best be deferred and accelerate those projects which in the national interest are most essential.

A. NEW, OR SUBSTANTIALLY NEW, STARTS

The new starts which my amendment proposes should be dropped from the bill are the following:

	Senate appropriations
Gila project:
Wellton canal	$30,000
Wellton lateral unit	70,000
Dome lateral unit	10,000
	110,000

Missouri Basin:
Jamestown unit	750,000
Missouri Souris	1,000,000
	1,750,000
Total	6,593,000

It is also interesting to note that the total estimated costs of the foregoing projects, for which we shall be asked to make increasing appropriations in the next few years if these starts are permitted now, is $166,404,000.

A table showing the total estimated costs of these projects, the amount estimated to be spent on them to June 30, 1950, and the pages of the House hearings where these figures and construction facts are given, follows:

[1] Senate report.

In the case of the last project, the Missouri-Souris Division, Missouri Diversion Unit, according to the testimony, there has been no final decision on the location of the canal to lead off from the diversion dam. (House hearings, pp. 907, 910.) And in reference to the related work of this division now in phase B, Mr. Warne, of the Bureau, frankly stated (House hearings, p. 911):

"There is a great deal of work that needs to be done before ultimate feasibility of the irrigation plans can be worked out for the Crosby-Mohall unit or the Jamestown unit or any of the distant units."

Since the estimated cost of phase A aspects of Missouri-Souris is $68,855,000, and the Crosby-Mohall and Devils Lake units in phase B will cost $268,953,000 and $21,077,000, respectively, in addition to $10,749,000 for the Jamestown unit, it sems wiser to halt this construction now (with only $1,432,747 spent on this phase A section through fiscal 1950), until all doubts have been removed concerning the economic feasibility of the project. How can we justify starting out on a road that leads to such enormous expenditures with so many significant questions unanswered? I suspect, although the record is not clear at this point, that provisions for repayment of the irrigation costs of the project are likewise most incomplete.

B. ELIMINATE CERTAIN SENATE INCREASES

In addition, I am suggesting that the following Senate increases over the House committee figures ought to be dropped. No adequate reason is given in the report for these increases:

Provo River project	$2,245,000
Riverton project	200,000
Missouri Basin project	3,000,000

C. FORTY-PERCENT REDUCTION IN COLORADO-BIG THOMPSON

My amendment also assumes a 40-percent, instead of a 25-percent, cut-back in the appropriation for the Colorado-Big Thompson project.

In justification for this higher cut-back, I note that the original estimate of the cost of this project was $44,000,000. The present estimated cost is $150,503,000 (House hearings, p. 662). A repayment contract, however, was made which provided that the water users should repay one-half of the cost of the project, but not to exceed $25,000,000 (House hearings, pp. 733, 738–741).

In other words on the basis of present figures the Government will be repaid for only about one-sixth of the cost of the project and the balance must be repaid, if at all, by electric-power revenues. While the Bureau's justification states that negotiations are under way for an amendatory or supplemental repayment contract, I believe it might help to persuade the water users that this is desirable if the rate of construction were sharply cut back.

This seems to be another example of a case where rising costs and project changes result in enormous increases in total costs, far beyond the estimates made at the time of the original authorization by Congress.

D. OTHER MISSOURI BASIN DEDUCTIONS

In connection with the Missouri Basin project, I would also urge elimination of further appropriations for the following projects for the reasons stated below:

(a) Cheyenne division—Key Hole unit ---------- $3,179,000

The Senate committee report (p. 152) states:

"The 1951 estimate for this project appears under phase A in the amount of $3,179,000, which has been allowed by the committee. However, representations have been made to the committee that the water supply on the Belle Fourche River is such that under the Wyoming-South Dakota compact of February 18, 1943, it may be difficult to fill this proposed reservoir. Under the terms of the compact between the two States, there is no limitation upon the number of small reservoirs which may be built in Wyoming. It is the opinion of the committee that a comprehensive study of the future water supply should be made before construction is undertaken."

The best way to guarantee that there will be no wasteful new construction until the availability of water is assured is to omit further appropriations.

(b) Phase B items ---------- $5,154,000

The total estimated cost of the Missouri Basin items listed in "Phase A" ("Units selected for construction") is $769,157,884. Starts have been made on all elements of this phase A. Although the total amount of appropriations authorized by law for the Missouri Basin program of the Bureau is only $350,000,000, the Government would appear to be effectively committed by the starts that have been made to the total of expenditures of $769,000,000.

Until phase A is more fully authorized and completed, it would appear to me unwise by this appropriation bill to permit expenditures on phase B ("Units being prepared for construction") which involves projects, the total estimated cost of which is an added $944,933,000.

In view of the serious questions as to the adequacy of water supply for the whole basin project and in view of the relatively small part of the total irrigation costs which it is estimated that water users will be able to repay, it seems to me that we should not only eliminate all items in phase B but possibly make even more drastic reductions in phase A.

I believe the Senate should also take note of the extent to which project costs in general far outrun original cost estimates, as I pointed out above in connection with the Colorado-Big Thompson project. As listed by the Bureau the original estimated cost of the projects included in the current bill was $1,682,487,174. The present estimated cost is $5,252,404,105. (House hearings, p. 662.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois to the committee amendment on page 247, in line 4.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I should like to make a brief statement about the amendment, and then I shall ask for the yeas and nays.

The amendment I have submitted to the committee amendment proposes that the appropriation for construction projects in the Bureau of Reclamation be reduced from approximately $295,000,000 to approximately $204,000,000, thus effecting a saving of approximately $91,000,000. In the discussion which has occurred, I have indicated that that reduction would be made, for example, by stopping all new construction starts and all essentially new starts, and by slowing up to the extent of 25 percent on projects already under way, with the exception of the Big Thompson-Colorado project, as to which I suggest a slowing-up rate of 40 percent. In the statement I have inserted, I have suggested several other possible reductions. However, the apportionment of the reduction to be made under my amendment to the committee amendment would be left in the hands of the Bureau of Reclamation, as is the case at the present time; and the Bureau of Reclamation could apportion the reduction to the extent of $91,000,000 in the same way the Bureau would apportion the proposed appropriation of $295,000,000—in other words, among the various projects; and the Bureau could do so in a way which would benefit those which are needed in the war effort.

Thus, Mr. President, the adoption of my amendment to the committee amendment would result in a reduction in the consumption of materials, and to that extent my amendment would aid the war effort.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois to the committee amendment on page 247, in line 4.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I should like to be heard on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment calls for an appropriation which is $2,754,000 less than the amount voted by the House, $31,253,500 less than the estimates, and $39,248,638 less than the amount appropriated for 1950.

In my judgment, the proposal made by the Senator from Illinois would mean that after the committee has cut this appropriation to the bone, to a point where just enough money is carried in the bill in order properly to carry on the work which now is going on, the construction projects now under way, now in process of construction, would have to be shut down.

I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Illinois on this point, Mr. President, because I am sure he does not realize the situation. If his amendment to the committee amendment prevails, inasmuch as the bill as reported by the committee will provide only sufficient funds to pay the contractors under existing contracts for the work on which they now are employed, then, when the contracts are stopped—as they will have to be stopped if the amendment of the Senator from Illinois to the committee amendment is adopted—we shall have to pay the contractors the damages which result from such stoppage. We had an illustration of that situation in California, last year, when such a stoppage cost the Government $700,000.

The effect of the Senator's proposal, if it is adopted by the Senate, simply will be that work now underway, which should be completed because it is in the interest of the war effort—for instance, the work involved in finishing hydroelectric projects, and similar work which is going on—will be delayed. Then, if the inflation which the Senator fears occurs, when we return to that work, it will take more dollars to finish it.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. LEHMAN. I would be perfectly willing to cut back on the appropriations for reclamation projects, even though, as the Senator knows, I have voted, both on the floor of the Senate and in committee, for every reclamation project, because I believe in them.

At this particular time I think it would be perfectly legitimate to delay some of the reclamation projects, but I do not wish to have any delay occur in the case of the power projects, because I believe they have a direct bearing on the war effort we have to make. In my opinion we should increase the production of power in every possible way, rather than restrict it.

Therefore, Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Arizona to what extent the amendment proposed by the distinguished Senator from Illinois to the committee amendment would, if adopted, interfere with the development of power facilities.

Mr. HAYDEN. First of all, Mr. President, in the case of the Colorado-Big Thompson project, to which the Senator from Illinois has referred, let me say that project can be finished, if there is any sort of a short war at all, in time to have the power from that project available for use during the war. However, if the amendment of the Senator from Illinois to the committee amendment is adopted, we shall not be able to obtain the power from that project during the war.

The same is true of the power features of the Central Valley project. Practically all these projects are multiple-purpose projects, and their power features are being pushed ahead of almost any other features.

However, Mr. President, so far as the irrigation features of the projects are concerned, let me say that all of us realize that we may need additional irrigation facilities in order to be able to irrigate more land, so that it can be cultivated for the production of crops which will be badly needed if we get into a war, at which time there would be difficulty in regard to importations.

On the other hand, when we already are under contract to make payments for further construction on projects already under way, it is perfectly foolish to make appropriation cuts of the kind which would be required by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois to the committee amendment.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Would it not be better to apply to hydroelectric lines which would supply power the funds which otherwise would be used for the construction of dams which would take years to complete?

Mr. HAYDEN. This amendment does not relate to new dams which will take years to construct.

Mr. FERGUSON. How long will it take to construct them?

Mr. HAYDEN. That will vary; but all the ones to which this item relates are under construction, and have been under construction for years.

All these projects were authorized before the war began. Construction on all of them was stopped during the war. Since the war, we have resumed construction on them, and construction has been continuing since that time.

Mr. FERGUSON. I appreciate that they are authorized years in advance.

Mr. HAYDEN. No; I mean that the money for their construction was carried in the appropriation bills in the 1940's. During the war period, construction on all of them was shut down for four or five years. Following the war construction work on them was resumed. We have been continuing with their construction since then; and they are reaching completion.

Mr. FERGUSON. But are we not now in the same position we were in when construction on them was shut down. In other words, we are in a war.

Mr. HAYDEN. But we made a mistake during the war, in my judgment, when we stopped the construction work. I know that is true in the case of the Davis Dam. We stopped the construction of that dam during the war, but there has been a crying need for power. It would have been the wisest thing to continue with the construction of that project and to have had the power from it available during the war. It was a terrific mistake to stop the construction of that project during the war.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois to the committee amendment on page 247, in line 4.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Again, Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois to the committee amendment on page 247, in line 4.

The amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Arizona, who is in charge of this portion of the bill. I wish to inquire in regard to the action of the committee in proposing a reduction from $297,467,000 to $294,713,000.

I understand that the effect of such a reduction will be to deny the appropriation of $1,400,000 for continuation of the work on the Havre-Shelby line or project, which now is nearing completion, and also to eliminate the appropriation of $365,000 which is necessary to construct the Canyon Ferry-Great Falls transmission line, which connects with the Canyon Ferry project.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct; it will make a reduction of $1,400,000 in the amount of money available for the Havre-Shelby line, and will also result in the other reduction which has been mentioned.

Let me explain to the Senator that, as he will remember, last year the Congress, in pursuit of a policy of arming the Reclamation Service with funds whereby it could negotiate on a basis of equality with the private power companies, provided funds for the construction of the Havre-Shelby line. I shall discuss it first.

At the time when that appropriation was made, it was understood that if the Montana Power & Light Co. would bring about a suitable wheeling contract to carry the power, the line would not necessarily be built.

It so happens that the situation which has developed in Montana is that in December the Reclamation Service made a contract for the construction of this line, but gave no go-ahead order to the contractor. The notice to proceed was issued on March 21, 1950. On April 12, the Montana Power & Light Co. obtained from the Montana Public Service Commission an order permitting it to reduce its rates to rural electric cooperatives to exactly the Government rate of 5½ mills.. If that action had been taken prior to the time when the contract was awarded or prior to the time when the contractor was notified to proceed with the work under the contract, there would really have been no excuse for building the line, because the primary purpose of the line is to get power to the REA cooperatives at the Government rate; and if power could be obtained from the private power company at the same rate, construction of the line would not be justified. However, the Montana Power & Light Co. was about 3 weeks late in obtaining the order permitting it to reduce the rate in the way I have stated. So the contract was let.

We are faced with that situation; and under the circumstances the committee felt that the Bureau of Reclamation was in a little too much of a hurry to let the contract. For that reason, the committee voted to disallow the funds at this time.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, the Senator will recall that an effort has been under way for many years to construct this project, so that low-cost Fort Peck power will be available to the farmers in that area, who have been denied this power during all this period of time. In 1947 the Senate appropriated funds for the construction of this line in 1948. At that time the Bureau of Reclamation did not hurry to let the contract—thinking that there might be a possibility of entering into a contract with the private power company. However, nothing happened. The Bureau of Reclamation continued to hold up the contract, and did so until very late in the year. Then, just before work was begun under the contract, Congress eliminated that appropriation.

Then the farmers in that area became despondent about the possibility of getting the project constructed. However, they continued to make efforts to obtain it. They had spent a great deal of money for that purpose, but they could not get any contract for service. They had to build a line at their own expense. That line connected with the Montana power system. Also it was necessary to purchase a steam plant there, to firm up the power. All that was necessary in order to make it possible to provide power to those who live in that area.

So, during all these years they have been struggling to get this project, and now, last year, after a very elaborate debate on the floor of the Senate, we succeeded in getting an appropriation with which to start the project. The project was not started, however, and contracts were not let for it until December of last year, waiting again to see whether anything could be accomplished with reference to making an agreement with the power company. The power company did not offer them any contract, did not offer them any wheeling agreement, and the result was that they finally had to start construction on the project.

The project has now been carried on to almost full completion. I have before me a statement from the Commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation in which he shows the status of construction at this time. It shows that the Government has already expended $892,136 and has obligations on the project amounting to $535,231. So the project cannot be stopped at this point, when it is almost finished.

Besides, it will be absolutely necessary to have this project. We cannot tear down the lines now and end the project at this point, because even if the Montana Power Co. could furnish power to the rural electric cooperatives there at the present time, the time is going to come when they will need more power, and will need stronger, heavier lines to carry that power. Besides there is a pumping project involved in the area which will require considerable power.

Mr. HAYDEN. But the representations made to the Committee on Appropriations were that if this appropriation were denied, the Montana Power Co. would then pay the Government for all materials and the lines, as I understood, and take them over. That is not clear in the record.

Mr. MURRAY. No, and it is not clear anywhere.

Mr. HAYDEN. Very well.

Mr. MURRAY. With whom are they going to contract? They have not offered an agreement to the farmers or to the Government.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is the point to which I am coming. This money has been allowed by the House, but has not been allowed by the Senate. If that point cannot be cleared up, it seems to me quite evident that the House is going to insist upon the appropriation. On the other hand, if it can be shown that the Government will come out whole without loss in this matter, and that in the meantime the REA cooperatives are receiving the benefit of this very low rate on the power of 5.5 mills, then we might be justified in taking it up. I think the best way to handle the matter is to take it to conference and see what the Montana Power Co. has to say about it at that time.

Mr. MURRAY. I should like to ask the Senator whether he does not think that this would be a very mistaken action in view of the emergency which is before the country at the present time; that is, to destroy this line, and to destroy this property? It is almost akin to arson. It would be a criminal destruction of property. We have a line already completed, and the Congress, because of some language picked up from the street or in the lobbies of the Congress, to the effect that the power company is going to compensate the Government for the destruction of this line, proposes to terminate construction and cancel the appropriation. I think it is the most unusual legislative action I have ever heard of.

Mr. HAYDEN. What the committee instructed me, as chairman of the subcommittee, was to inquire first of the Reclamation Service as to the progress on the work at that time. At the time we acted on this item we had that information. I was also instructed to inquire of the Montana Power Co. as to what its attitude would be about taking the property off the hands of the Government, and, while there is no firm commitment at the moment——

Mr. MURRAY. No.

Mr. HAYDEN. We were given to understand that the power company would do that. Before this question is ultimately settled in conference, that will have to be determined.

Mr. MURRAY. The Senator said the power company would do that. What is the agreement it proposes? What does it propose to do?

Mr. HAYDEN. To take over all the materials and to take over the line so far as it has been built, as I understand.

Mr. MURRAY. What does it propose to offer to the rural cooperatives who are involved?

Mr. HAYDEN. A low rate for power.

Mr. MURRAY. A low rate for power?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. MURRAY. But it does not propose to give them the lines which would be needed in order to enable the cooperatives to secure adequate service.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the line is to be built, as the Senator states, of course it will have to be completed either by the Government or by the private power company.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. As I remember, the evidence shows that 9 of the 11 cooperatives are now being furnished with power as cheaply as they could obtain it if they were to manufacture it themselves. Is not that correct?

Mr. MURRAY. That is not involved in this item.

Mr. HAYDEN. It is the same identical rate as that at which the Government offers to supply it.

Mr. ELLENDER. But it is all involved in the question, is it not?

Mr. MURRAY. It is not involved in this item, because it is entirely separate and apart from the contracts they may enter into with the power company in other sections of the State. But here is a situation in which the power company has failed to offer a contract during all these years, and does not now offer a contract. No one knows what it proposes to give to the rural cooperatives in the way of adequate service and future low rates.

Mr. HAYDEN. Oh, yes; they have the rate fixed by the Montana Power Commission. If any REA cooperative applies to them, and they serve it with power, it shall have the benefit of the rate of 5.5 mills, which is exactly the same as the Government rate.

Mr. ELLENDER. That was my understanding.

Mr. MURRAY. Then that would mean that there would be turned over to the Montana Power Co. a complete monopoly of the power coming from the Fort Peck Dam. At the present time, the Fort Peck Dam is carrying that power down to Great Falls, where the Montana Power Co. takes it. If a contract of that kind is given to the Montana Power Co., it would mean that the Bureau of Reclamation will lose the difference between 2.5 mills for power and 5.5 mills, so that the Government will be losing 3 mills per kilowatt hour, which the Montana Power Co. secured as a result of that situation, and that deprives the project of the opportunity to repay.

Mr. HAYDEN. That matter was not presented to the subcommittee, but it certainly will have to be considered when the bill goes to conference. My suggestion is that this matter be taken to conference, and that those who are interested otherwise can ask the Montana Power Co. to come forward with a clean-cut, specific proposition. If it does not have one, then that is one thing. If it has a proposition that will save the Government whole and free of cost, then I think the situation would be different.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. HILL. The Senator says, which would hold the Government free of any cost whatever. How much money has the Government invested in this project at this time?

Mr. HAYDEN. The Government has about $800,000 in it now, and the cost will be close to, but under, $2,000,000.

Mr. HILL. But there has already been expended on this project about $800,000 of the Government's money; is that correct?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. MURRAY. And, in addition to that, another $400,000 to $500,000 has been obligated.

Mr. HILL. Does the Senator mean that that has been contracted for?

Mr. MURRAY. I mean contract obligations.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Nebraska let me finish first?

Mr. WHERRY. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Is there a supplemental contract obligation of $400,000 to $500,000, in addition?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes. The contractor has agreed to build the entire line, and he has been paid for his work as it has proceeded.

Mr. HILL. Then the Government really has an interest in the matter to the extent of $1,200,000 or $1,300,000, has it not?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Does the distinguished Senator from Arizona have any information in writing from anyone in authority connected with the Montana Power Co. as to what the power company will do in this matter?

Mr. HAYDEN. We have a telegram from them. The work was just starting on the line when we had our hearings. The work had been halted by the blizzard. The representation made at that time was that the company would take off the hands of the Government all the material it had. The missing part of the understanding is, What is to be done to compensate the contractor for the profits he otherwise would make? The committee said, "If we can save a million dollars, let us save it."

Mr. HILL. From whom is that representation?

Mr. HAYDEN. From E. J. Corette, vice president of the Montana Power Co.

Mr. HILL. He did not go into the question of what our debt may be to the contractor, did he?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; but he did agree to take off our hands all the material on the ground and to take over the line.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point a statement from the Commissioner of Reclamation with reference to the status of the line, and also an extract from the report of the chief engineer on the status of construction and material contracts.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hon. MICHAEL J. KIRWAN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. KIRWAN: In order that you may be informed as to the present status of construction on the Havre-Shelby line and substations, we are enclosing a statement on the status of funds and construction progress as of June 30, 1950, and estimated progress as of July 31, 1950.

Sincerely yours,

MICHAEL W. STRAUS,
Commissioner.

If construction is stopped we would have an uncompleted facility incapable of serving any useful function, and of the $1,427,367 expended or obligated as of July 31, 1950, the Government would suffer a direct loss of approximately $600,000, since the $200,000 expended for right-of-way, design, engineering, and administration, and approximately $400,000, consisting of contractors' profits, construction costs, termination costs, and supervision and legal expenditures could never be recovered. This assumes a salvage value of approximately $800,000 for material and equipment, which is questionable, since some of it is special equipment and might have only a nominal salvage value, in which case the direct loss to the Government could run as high as a million dollars.

In addition, if the Havre-Shelby Line is not completed and placed in service by the Government, the Fort Peck project will lose a principal outlet for firm power. This may well result in requiring the project to sell firm power which has a value of 5.5 mills per kilowatt-hour at a rate for dump energy, or 2.5 mills, a loss of 3 mills. After the load has been built up over a period of 10 years it will result in an estimated annual loss of almost $250,000.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD a telegram sent by direction of the subcommittee to Mr. J. E. Corette, vice president of the Montana Power Co., and his reply thereto.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JUNE 29, 1950.

Mr. J. E. CORETTE,
Vice President, Montana Power Co.,
Butte, Mont.:

Members of Subcommittee on Interior Department Appropriations have asked me to submit to you following information relative to Havre-Shelby line obtained from Reclamation Bureau: (1) Due to favorable bids under estimate, total estimated cost has been reduced from $2,860,000 to $1,912,000; (2) estimated contract expenditures as of June 30, 1950, for materials are $202,000 and for progress payments on 23 supply contracts and 2 construction contracts are $295,000; (3) in addition to above contract expenditures an additional amount of approximately $155,000 has been expended for engineering, right-of-way, and administration; (4) in addition contractor has on hand approximately $115,000 of supplies for which certified invoices have not as yet been submitted to Reclamation Bureau; (5) therefore, total actual expenditures and contractors' earnings as of June 30, 1950, plus material on hand by contractor amount to $767,000; (6) status of work is reported as follows: 4 miles of poles hauled to site; 1⅞ miles of holes dug; 2 miles of structures framed, and erection was started on June 26, 1950, and on Havre substation grading is completed; structure excavation is 75 percent completed; and concrete work is 13 percent completed. Subcommittee would like to have your comments on above factual statement and what the Montana Power Co. would be willing to do under present circumstances. Subcommittee would also like to have a statement from you as to present status of the negotiations with the Interior Department for a wheeling contract and how near you are to an agreement on same. Please wire reply at once as subcommittee meets again tomorrow, Friday.

CARL HAYDEN,
Chairman, Interior Department Appriations Subcommittee.

GREAT FALLS, MONT., June 30, 1950.

Senator CARL HAYDEN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Interior Department Appropriations,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Have no source of information to check items on (1) to (5), inclusive, of your telegram.

Item (6) appears accurate but this is very little work toward completion of 100 miles of lines; in addition, excavation, grading, and foundations are only a small part of the cost of a substation and this work has just been started.

Important facts are that Bureau let all contract for Havre-Shelby line and substations after money was appropriated by Senate with the very clear understanding and statement that no money should be spent if arrangement could be made with Montana Power Co. to serve REA's involved at Bureau of Reclamation rate.

At hearing before your committee on April 20, Mr. McPhail was told by you personally and by other committee members that money was appropriated for this line with such understanding. Our information is that "go ahead" order was not given to contractor on Havre-Shelby line until approximately April 22.

In addition, on April 12, Montana Public Service Commission approved a Montana Power Co. rate for power company rate for power to Marias, Hill, and all other REA's on our system, which is identical to Bureau's rate, thereby eliminating any possibility of any saving to the REA's or anyone else by building the Havre-Shelby line.

The facts clearly indicate to us that Bureau has not acted in good faith with you or with the Senate but has deliberately created a situation to make it difficult for your committee to rescind the appropriation made last year for this line.

This has been done in spite of the fact that no benefits could result from building of this line.

Our company is still willing to purchase at your cost all materials which have been acquired for this line.

As to the Wheeling contracts, we have a contract with Bonneville and supply all REA's in far western Montana under it. Bureau refused to make with us a contract similar to the Bonneville contract and we could not agree on a rate to be paid for Wheeling because Bureau insisted on paying only 1 mill per kilowatt-hour even though Wheeling distance was approximately 150 miles instead of 50 miles as in North Dakota contracts in which the 1-mill rate was established.

In view of this deadlock we reduced our rate to the Bureau rate, thereby accomplishing every benefit that could result from a Wheeling contract plus saving the Bureau all expense that would necessarily result from its serving these customers. We understand from discussion last week between Mr. McPhail and our counsel, Mr. Glover, that Bureau agrees that Wheeling agreement to REA's is now unnecessary as they already have power at Bureau rate.

Only negotiations pending with the Bureau regarding Wheeling are from Canyon Ferry to Crow Creek irrigation pumping plant and for use of our two 100,000-volt lines between Canyon Ferry and Great Falls to interconnect Canyon Ferry plant and Bureau's Fort Peck line. We believe these negotiations will result in satisfactory agreements to both parties.

As we see the situation, every additional dollar spent on Havre-Shelby line will be wasted, as there are no benefits to be accomplished; and sensible thing would be for Bureau to cancel all contracts and reduce expenses to a minimum. Undoubtedly every contract has a provision that it is subject to appropriations by Congress.

Am sending this telegram from Great Falls but will be in my office in Butte all day Friday and would be pleased to answer any further inquiries.

We certainly hope that you will rescind last year's appropriation for Havre-Shelby line, thereby carrying out the intention clearly expressed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD last fall and saving as much money as possible.

Respectfully,
THE MONTANA POWER CO.,
J. E. CORETTE, Jr., Vice President.

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. GURNEY. I am a member of the subcommittee. I should like to ask if it is not correct that the total cost of the Havre-Shelby line was approximately $2,000,000, or was it a little more than that amount?

Mr. HAYDEN. It was originally estimated to be $2,880,000, but it was reduced, by a favorable bid, to $1,912,000.

Mr. GURNEY. It was very close to $2,000,000.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

Mr. GURNEY. The information received from the Bureau, as I remember, was to the effect that along with materials and expected profits there was an obligation of approximately $800,000.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

Mr. GURNEY. Materials on hand, which the Montana Power Co. agreed to buy at the cost to the Government, would amount to approximately $500,000. Therefore there is a possible net loss to the Government of between $200,000 and $300,000. That, I believe, was the understanding of the committee on which it based its decision not to build the line, inasmuch as there would be no lowered cost to the cooperative below the 5½-mills rate at which the Montana Power Co. agreed to furnish current. That is the same rate, of course, the cooperative would pay if it received the Bureau power. Therefore, as I see it at this time, when we need money and materials, we can save the expenditure of the money and save the use of the materials, because the Montana Power Co. is already connected with the Havre-Shelby cooperative, as I understand. We have before us an expense of $300,000 instead of a total of $1,900,000. That was the background for the subcommittee's making the recommendation to the full committee and to the Senate.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, some of the farmers in the western section of North Dakota are very much interested because they are expecting to get power. But a letter from the Commissioner indicates that the figures quoted a moment ago by the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY] are not accurate. Here is what is going to happen in case construction is stopped, according to Mr. Straus:

> If construction is stopped, we would have an uncompleted facility incapable of serving any useful function, and of the $1,427,367 expended or obligated as of July 31, 1950, the Government would suffer a direct loss of approximately $600,000, since the $200,000 expended for right-of-way, design, engineering, and administration and approximately $400,000 consisting of contractors' profits, construction costs, termination costs, and supervision and legal expenditures could never be recovered. This assumes a salvage value of approximately $800,000 for material and equipment, which is questionable since some of it is special equipment and might have only a nominal salvage value, in which case the direct loss to the Government could run as high as a million dollars.
> In addition, if the Havre-Shelby line is not completed and placed in service by the Government, the Fort Peck project will lose a principal outlet for firm power. This may result in requiring the project to sell firm power which has a value of 5.5 mills per kilowatt-hour at a rate for dump energy, or 2.5 mills, a loss of 3 mills. After the load has been built up over a period of 10 years, it will result in an estimated annual loss of almost $250,000.

That, Mr. President, is apparently the whole story. So it is much more serious than we have been led to assume. I am delighted to know that the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] is leading this fight because hundreds of thousands of farmers are interested in the question of whether they are going to get cheap power or whether the Montana Power Co. is going to have a monopoly. It seems to me that the stopping of this line is entirely wrong.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. HILL. If anyone will read the telegram which the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee sent to Mr. J. E. Corette, vice president of the Montana Power Co., under date of June 29, 1950, and the telegram of Mr. Corette in reply, he will see that the Montana Power Co. certainly very skillfully evaded any direct answer to the chairman's telegram, and did not at any place in the telegram say that the Montana Power Co. would hold the Government free of all costs and expenses which had gone into the line. If the power company is willing to do anything, it has certainly kept it a deep, dark secret up to this time.

Mr. HAYDEN. The committee acted on the information available to it at the time. I am quite sure that when the bill goes to conference we shall have to have more information from both the Reclamation Service and the Montana Power Co., and the conferees can then decide what to do about it. For that reason I should prefer that the bill remain as it is when it is taken to conference.

Mr. MURRAY. When the conference meets, the conferees will not be able to hold any hearings or get any facts developed with reference to the situation with regard to the expense of completing the line. They will not be able to know what the company will do.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator is mistaken. The custom is to act on these matters and get the very latest available information. I can assure the Senator that we shall have accurate information as to exactly what the situation is when the matter is taken up in conference, and we shall also have, if it is possible to obtain it, definite information from the Montana Power Co. as to how much it is willing to pay.

Mr. MURRAY. Will the conferees have information from the farmers interested in this matter? Will they know what the farmers' position is with reference to the ability of the Montana Power Co. to furnish them with adequate power?

I understand they claim that the present line of the Montana Power Co. is totally insufficient to carry the load. Besides, there is a pumping project in that district which will require great quantities of electric power because it involves a hundred thousand acres of land.

Mr. HAYDEN. As I understand, the transmission line will be finished within 30 days. The poles will be in the ground and the wire will be on the poles.

Mr. MURRAY. It is a question of whether we will turn it over to the Montana Power Co., and give them a monopoly of the power.

Mr. HAYDEN. I understand that, but we have appropriated the money with the understanding that if they would reduce rates and render the service, it would not be necessary to build the line. The money would not have been obtained on any other basis. That is how we proceeded in the case of the Southwest Power Administration. We took $6,000,000 out of the bill. We made the same arrangement elsewhere. The interval between the time when the contract was let and the power company reduced its rate complicates this case somewhat, and therefore is not exactly like the other cases. Nevertheless, the money would not have been appropriated by Congress if we had not believed the circumstances to be as stated; and so, the committee said, "If the company will do it, we can save the Government some money."

Mr. MURRAY. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the contention of rural electric cooperatives in this field, who have been claiming for a long time that because they could not get adequate service over the company's line, they were compelled to build a line themselves to the Montana Power Co. line in order to hook onto it. In addition to that, as I said a little while ago, they had to buy a steam plant, because available power was insufficient.

Mr. ECTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield.

Mr. ECTON. The Marias Cooperative built their lines several years ago, and they have those lines. Is that not correct?

Mr. MURRAY. They have built their lines. The Marias Cooperative have their own system.

Mr. ECTON. They have their own system.

Mr. MURRAY. They had it originally, and they want to take advantage of their right to have access to Fort Peck power. I think they are entitled to it. They are preferred customers for that power, and they ought to be permitted to use it.

Mr. HAYDEN. The subcommittee was in an embarrassing position. One Senator from Montana was urging us to allow the appropriation, while the other Senator was suggesting that it be disallowed. A situation like that is always embarrassing. I have in my hand the latest information from the Commissioner of Reclamation with respect to the status of this line, and I should like to put it in the hands of the junior Senator from Montana with the request that he send it to the Montana Power Co., and ask them to come back with a very definite offer as to what they will do in the light of the representations now made by the Bureau of Reclamation. We acted on information which was a month or 6 weeks old. If we could know definitely in conference what the power company proposes to do, and could see how much it would cost the United States, one way or another, the conferees could consider the matter with some degree of intelligence. If not, I do not see that the Senate conferees can do anything but recede. On the other hand, if the Montana Power Co. can come in with a clear-cut proposition to show that the Treasury of the United States is not going to lose anything, I think the Senate conferees ought to stand by what has been done.

Mr. GURNEY. I think the proposal would be a very fine solution of this problem. Personally, I want to see the cooperatives get adequate power at the Government rate of 5½ mills. I do not want to appropriate any Federal money at this time, especially for duplicating lines. I want to be sure that the Government's interests are preserved. If we have a proposal from the Bureau setting forth the status of the contract at this time, and the Montana Power Co. will agree to buy the material, or make some other agreement, and it appears to the conferees that it is a reasonable solution of this problem, I think that is the best we could do. The matter could be very well handled in conference.

Mr. HAYDEN. I think that is the best we can do. Would the distinguished Senator from Montana be willing to do that?

Mr. ECTON. I did not hear the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. I have here the latest information issued by the Bureau of Reclamation, dated July 11 and July 14, as to the status of this transmission line, showing how far it has gone, what it has cost, and what the estimates on it are. The conferees would like to know what the Montana Power Co. proposes to do at this time under the circumstances.

Mr. ECTON. The information I have from the Montana Power Co. officials, which I think the distinguished Senator from Arizona has, is that the company is perfectly willing to take from the Government at cost all the material which is now on the job, so the Government will not lose any of the cost in that respect. What the liability to the contractor would be I am not prepared to say.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am asking if I give the Senator these letters will he transmit them to the Montana Power Co. with the understanding that by the time the bill comes to conference we will have a statement from them?

Mr. ECTON. I am willing to cooperate. However, I would suggest, since the Senator from Arizona has been handling the matter, that he do it, and that the information be sent directly to him.

Mr. HAYDEN. I shall do it that way.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I should like to continue with this discussion. In connection with the point which arises with reference to the sufficiency of the present transmission lines of the Montana Power Co., I wish to call attention to the fact that farmers in this area expect to have a power failure this winter. They wrote a letter to the local power manager of the Bureau of Reclamation at Great Falls, asking for the right to lease this unfinished line so that they may be able to get more power for their cooperatives, I should like to have the letter inserted in the RECORD. In it the Marias Cooperative, writing to the Bureau of Reclamation manager at Great Falls, says:

I have discussed with you our desire to temporarily lease the use of your Havre-Shelby transmission line on the section from Chester to Shelby, Mont., to relieve our power shortage for this coming winter's load; as it is my understanding that when the contracts were let on the Havre-Shelby transmission line that the construction of the line would be completed by October 1, of this year. We have made extensive inquiries for the rental of transformers which we will transform from 69,000 volts to either 7200/12000/400Y or to 34,500, which we prefer; provided, we can find transformers of capacity sufficient to serve our additional power requirements.

The letter continues to show the insufficiency of the present transmission line. The Montana Power Co. does not offer any agreement to increase those lines. Therefore, it seems to me that the construction of the Havre-Shelby line is absolutely essential. It seems to me it would be a criminal act to destroy the line after it has been practically finished.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARIAS RIVER ELECTRIC COOPERATIVE,
Shelby, Mont., July 12, 1950.

Mr. CHESTER BRAZIL,
Power Manager, Reclamation Bureau, Great Falls, Mont.

DEAR MR. BRAZIL: I have discussed with you our desire to temporarily lease the use of your Havre-Shelby transmission line on the section from Chester to Shelby, Mont., to relieve our power shortage for this coming winter's load; as it is my understanding that when the contracts were let on the Havre-Shelby transmission line that the construction of the line would be completed by October 1, of this year. We have made extensive inquiries for the rental of transformers which we will transform from 69,000 volts to either 7200/12000/400Y or to 34,500, which we prefer; provided, we can find transformers of capacity sufficient to serve our additional power requirements.

We had a peak load of approximately 4,200 kilowatts last year; and even with our plant generating at full capacity, we were unable to hold a satisfactory voltage regulation on this peak load; and therefore, we anticipate a great deal more trouble this coming winter than we had the last winter.

Please bear in mind, that we have a transmission line from Conrad to Shelby and purchase power from the Montana Power Co. to supplement our generating capacity, and operate our plant in parallel with the power company's plants.

We anticipate a normal peak of 5,200 kilowatts this December, which will be increased by another 200 kilowatts; provided our allocations are completed to serve areas that we anticipate construction on this fall.

We will be urgently in need of power for next winter's use, in addition to what we can now generate and expect to receive from the Montana Power Co. over the present transmission line hook-up; and I would appreciate your immediate advice as to what we can expect relative to the completion of the Havre-Shelby line and the possibility of leasing it temporarily to relieve our power situation, or that the Bureau of Reclamation furnish us with an additional 2,000 kilowatts of supplemental power delivered to Shelby over that portion of the Havre-Shelby transmission line at our substation which would be located in the vicinity of the proposed Bureau substation.

Your immediate advice on these matters will be greatly appreciated, as the time is drawing near when action will be necessary.

Very truly yours,

R. O. MCPHILLIPS,
Manager.

Mr. ECTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield.

Mr. ECTON. I wonder if the Senator knows that the Montana Power Co. has offered to double their voltage on the line so that everyone will be able to have sufficient power. Is the Senator familiar with that?

Mr. MURRAY. I have been familiar with the proposals which the Montana Power Co. has been making over the years. For the last 5 or 6 years we have failed to get any satisfactory agreement from them which would enable the cooperatives to get the power which they need.

In addition to that, as I said a little while ago, we will need this transmission line more than ever as a result of the Marias pumping project, which undertakes to irrigate 100,000 acres of the valuable land in that area.

Mr. President, this is a most unusual and arbitrary action and will, if approved, result in denying the farmers of the section of Montana involved an adequate and efficient program of rural electrification at reasonable cost. In addition, it will result in a tremendous loss to the Government because this line is already nearing completion and the funds which we appropriated last year have already been paid out or almost completely obligated and cannot now be recaptured.

Furthermore, the meaning and net effect of this procedure will be to turn over to the Montana Power Co. a monopoly of the power generated at the Fort Peck Government Project and repudiate the program of the Bureau of Reclamation in furnishing power to REA's at low rates for rural electrification.

There are three cooperatives involved in that program. It is in a very rich agricultural section of the State of Montana, and the successful development of this area is entirely dependent upon an adequate supply of firm power at a reasonably low cost.

There is also in this area as I have stated a potential irrigation pumping development on the Marias project that could be served by the Havre-Shelby line. This development of over 100,000 acres of good irrigable land can be placed under water by the proper location of irrigation pumping plants. It is estimated that the annual energy required for such purpose may reach a total of over 4,000,000 kilowatt-hours annually. Without the Havre-Shelby line it would be necessary for the Marias pumping project to secure its power from the Montana Power Co. at a higher rate than this power could be obtained from the Fort Peck project.

Of course, the agreement which the Montana Power Co. is now offering, of 5.5 mills for the power they propose to sell to cooperatives, does not apply to the pumping project. That would have to be a separate contract, and the farmers there would have to pay an excessive price for the power, which would practically render the project unfeasible.

Mr. President, I should like to refer to some other background history of this controversy. This struggle on the part of the REA's in Montana to secure low-cost power, which they had been guaranteed by Congress, has been going on for many years. During all that time we have made efforts to make agreements with the power company, but they have never taken any interest in these rural cooperatives until just recently.

At the outset of this effort of the farmers to get power on their farms, the Montana Power Co. displayed no interest whatsoever in serving these cooperatives or in providing adequate transmission facilities for such purpose. The company simply stood by with their control of the power from the Fort Peck Government project and undertook to block the development of these cooperatives. It was not until the Bureau of Reclamation proposed construction of the Havre-Shelby line that the company suddenly became interested. That was back in 1947. I have already described the situation then. The Congress appropriated funds in 1947 to build this line. If the Bureau of Reclamation had proceeded expeditiously, they could have completed the transmission line at that time. I remember some of the farmers who came here testifying about that—and I think the Senator from Arizona will recall it. They said some of the officials of the Bureau of Reclamation should have been shot for their failure to proceed with the construction of the line. It seems that some people are going to criticize the Bureau of Reclamation this time because they have proceeded. At any rate, the farmers were getting no power.

The Congress, finally taking cognizance of all these factors, back in 1947 appropriated funds for the fiscal year 1948 to provide for initiating construction of this line and substations. A large percentage of the line was then surveyed and staked out, designs and specifications prepared, and invitations for bids published during the fiscal year 1948. During all this time the Montana Power Co. offered no satisfactory program to serve these cooperatives, but continued to oppose the program in every way possible and maintained a powerful lobby in Washington for that purpose.

Just prior to awarding the contract for construction the Congress, because of this pressure of the power interests, rescinded its 1948 fiscal year appropriation. This action of the Congress was a severe shock to the REA's. It left the people of the Havre-Shelby area totally dependent upon an inadequate, makeshift, and completely unsatisfactory system consisting of low-voltage transmission lines owned by the Montana Power Co. and supplemented by a line belonging to the REA's and a steam-generating plant at Shelby which the REA's were compelled to purchase in order to provide some semblance of service, although clearly inadequate.

After the action of Congress rescinding the 1948 appropriations for this line the REA cooperatives were deeply concerned as to their future expansion and development. They had already expended large sums of money and were despondent over the future, but continued the struggle. It was clearly shown at the hearings before the committee that the REA development in the Havre-Shelby area depended entirely upon the construction of the Havre-Shelby line.

On the basis of these well-established facts, developed in extensive hearings, the Congress last year, after a very elaborate debate, appropriated funds for the construction of the Havre-Shelby line for the fiscal year 1950. At no time during the Senate debate last year on the appropriations for the fiscal year 1950 did the Montana Power Co. offer adequate service under a proper agreement for these REA's. Never a thing; they just stood by, hoping they could beat them. They were successful before the committee in knocking out all the appropriations for transmission lines in Montana, but when it came to the floor of the Senate they were defeated. They did not even then try to enter into any agreement with the rural cooperatives in Montana.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HILL. It was the fine and able efforts of the senior Senator from Montana on this floor that got the money for that line, of course.

Mr. MURRAY. Assisted by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], and many other Senators, who recognize the merits of the program. It seemed utterly ridiculous that the Government should build the Fort Peck Dam and have all this power available to these preferred customers, and then that they should be shut out of the power by the action of the Montana Power Co., which undertakes to get a monopoly of the power from that project. I think it is utterly indefensible.

During all the months intervening since the fiscal year 1950 appropriations were made, there was no effort to provide a wheeling agreement or adequate transmission facilities to serve this area. The Montana Power Co. having offered no wheeling agreement, the Bureau of Reclamation in good faith and under instructions from the Congress awarded a contract on December 28, 1949, for materials and construction of the line.

Mr. ECTON. Mr. President, will my colleague yield at that point?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield.

Mr. ECTON. Is the Senator aware of the fact that the Montana Power Co. had a contract signed by nine REA cooperatives in that area who were willing to take the company's power, but the REA here in Washington refused to approve it?

Mr. MURRAY. That does not relate to this section of the State of Montana at all; that is an entirely different situation.

Mr. ECTON. I should be pleased if the Senator would tell me to what section of Montana he refers.

Mr. MURRAY. I am referring to the section of Montana which will receive service from the Havre-Shelby line, in the northern section of the State, where these three very large cooperatives which have spent a great deal of money trying to get power during the past 6 of 7 years are located. I am referring to that area, where they should have access to the power from Fort Peck, but they have been denied it all these years by the maneuverings of the Montana Power Co. and their failure to give them a fair and decent contract.

Mr. ECTON. Is not the Senator aware of the fact that the two cooperatives involved have been offered the same rate as the others, namely, 5.5 mills, the same as the Government rate?

Mr. MURRAY. Yes; but that means that the Bureau of Reclamation will have to turn over to the Montana Power Co. a monopoly of power from Fort Peck, and lose 3 mills per kilowatt on all the power hereafter which comes from that project, which will amount, as the Senator from North Dakota showed a little while ago, to a quarter of a million dollars a year.

The power company continued, all during the winter and spring, to refuse to enter into any deal with these cooperatives, and after failing to block the movement in the House, the power company officials then rushed back to Montana and went before the State railroad commission, which regulates the rates for utilities.

They appeared one day and submitted these revised rates, and the railroad commission acted on it the very same day, and put the rates in operation. This, however, did not occur until long after the contract was let for construction of the Havre-Shelby line and long after it was in course of construction. In view of that action by the commission it would seem to me that later on, after a few years, they will be able to go to the Montana Railroad Commission and get the commission to revise the rates, to raise the rates they may charge the farmers. That is something which can readily be expected, because they naturally have power and influence in the State with reference to the regulatory body, and I am satisfied that the company will receive such increase if it asks for it.

I believe this action before the Montana Commission is significant in that there is a possiblity that the company, once the Government is deprived of the right to serve these REA's, may make representations at a later time to the commission that its rates should be raised. It seems reasonable to assume that it might be successful in accomplishing this even without holding public hearings. That is very significant as far as the REA cooperatives are concerned since, in view of the manner in which this rate reduction was handled, there is grave doubt as to the future. But, Mr. President, this rate reduction was not accompanied by any agreement to provide transmission facilities to carry full service to the area.
